The Southern States, seventeen in number, including the District of Columbia, are usually classed together as a section of the country requiring special help. Of all but Maryland, Missouri, and the District of Columbia this is true. The following table exhibits their condition:

a In Delaware the colored public schools have been supported by the school-tax collected from colored citizens only; recently, however, they have received an appropriation of $2,400 from the State; in Kentucky the school-tax collected from colored citizens is the only State appropriation for the support of colored schools; in Maryland there is a biennial appropriation by the Legislature; in the District of Columbia one third of the school money is set apart for colored public schools, and in the other States mentioned above the school moneys are divided in proportion to the school population, without regard to race. b Several counties failed to make race distinctions. c Estimated. d In 1879. e For whites the school age is 6 to 20; for colored 6 to 16. f Census of 1870. g In 1877. h These numbers include some duplicates; the actual school population is 230,527.

Excluding the States of Maryland and Missouri and the District of Columbia, and the total yearly expenditure for both races is only $7,339,932, while in the whole country the annual expenditure is, from taxation $70,341,435, and from school funds $6,580,632, or a total of $76,922,067 (see tables 2 and 7), or one-tenth of the whole, while they contain one-fifth of the school population. The causes which have produced this state of things in the Southern States are far less important than the facts themselves as they now exist. To find a remedy and to apply it is the only duty which devolves upon us. Without universal education not only will the late war prove to be a failure, but the abolition of slavery be proved to be a tremendous disaster, if not a crime.

a Per cent. preceded by the minus sign indicates a decrease.
b In Pennsylvania occupations are also valued for assessment. This valuation for 1880 was $68,659,580.
c Virginia and West Virginia are taken together, as West Virginia belonged to Virginia in 1860.
d Average for the United States.

In this connection it is proper to observe that in the States where slavery existed in 1860 the valuation then aggregated $2,289,029,642, of which $842,927,400 was in slaves, and proper allowance must be made for this fact in estimating present power to bear taxation. The negroes were then taxed; they were productive as property. Now they require to be educated; then education would have destroyed them as property They are now doing little more as a totality than to support themselves. Their taxable property is thus far very slight.

The following table gives the actual taxation for the support of schools in the year 1880:

a A large number attend school beyond the school age, which carries the enrollment above the total school population, so that the absence of those of school age does not appear. b Allowing one teacher to each fifty pupils. c Allowing one school-house of a cost of $300 to fifty pupils. (d) Allowing one year at a normal school at a cost of $250. e This is the additional cost of a school of three months for the non-attending persons of school age according to the returns for 1881; other returns can be made for 1882. f This is an expense incurred by each parent, and, though not a public tax, is a part of the additional expense to be incurred by the communities.

e This is an expense incurred by each parent, and, though not a public tax, is a part of the additional expense to be incurred by the community.

Mr. President, the Committee on Education and Labor has also reported another bill, the purpose of which is to provide a perpetual fund for distribution among the States and Territories for the support of common schools. For the first ten years it is proposed that that distribution be made on the basis of illiteracy, and ever afterward on that of actual population. The proposition is to found a fund, and to increase that fund by placing to its account every year the proceeds of the sales of public lands and one-half the income from the land-grant railroads of the country, so called, and to distribute not the money itself thus received, but the interest thereof.

Of course, at the beginning the amount for distribution would be very trifling, as the interest upon the three, four, or five million, whatever the amount might be, which would be passed to the credit of this fund as the accumulation from the two sources mentioned, for the first year would be very little indeed; but gradually it would increase, and in the course of ten years the amount of interest that would be likely to accrue for distribution would become of essential consequence. It might reach in ten years the amount of three or four million dollars, and ever afterward it would continue to increase.

That bill has in substance been before the country for ten or twelve years. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] whom I do not now see in his seat was one of the earliest and strongest advocates of that measure, and the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has identified his name with it as he has with so many other of the great measures of legislation which have been enacted during the last twenty years in this country. That measure has received the sanction of the Senate upon, I think, more than one occasion. It has failed to pass the House of Representatives heretofore. At some time that bill will come up for consideration by the Senate.

The Committee on Education and Labor looked upon these two bills as entirely harmonious in their relation with each other, the one now being discussed relating only to a temporary exigency, proposing to distribute a larger amount of money immediately to reach an existing difficulty, in order to equalize the educational condition of the country as a whole, and the other bill would naturally supplement it, and about the time the fund from the temporary-aid bill shall disappear something substantial will be coming from this.

I make these remarks at this time in order that I may introduce, as bearing upon the general subject of national aid to education and as contributing something to the symmetry of the discussion, which must include that bill earlier or later, certain documentary matter. I present table No. 25, showing the aggregate amount received from the disposal of public lands in the past twenty years, and one-half the yearly amount received from the railroads, and the yearly income to be derived upon an average yearly amount at 4 per cent. for each of the next ten years for school purposes; a like table, No. 26, giving the income from railroads for three and a half years; and table No. 27, showing the disposals of the public lands and the amount received therefrom in each fiscal year from July 1, 1862, to June 30, 1882, inclusive. I think these tables, in connection with the others which I have already introduced, will furnish to the Senate and to everybody practically all the statistical information that exists in this country in the possession of the Government, from its archives, as bearing on the subject-matter of education.

TABLE 25.—Showing aggregate amount received from the disposal of public lands in the past twenty years, $49,874,303.38; average amount per year, $2,443,715.17; one-half of the yearly amount received from railroads, $223,689.92.

Mr. President, I now come to certain propositions which I think are fairly deducible from the premises already laid down. These propositions are, I think, true:

First. That intelligence and virtue generally diffused among the masses of the people are necessary conditions to the existence of republican governments in the nation and in the States.

Second. That in so far as ignorance and vice exist republican governments fail, and that although the forms of freedom may continue, yet the substance will be eaten out and ultimately the fabric itself will fall.

Third. That there is now in all parts of the country a dangerous degree of ignorance among the people, and that those invested with the sovereignty, which is the suffrage, are by reason of ignorance to a dangerous degree unfitted to exercise the functions of government.

Fourth. That this mass of ignorance is increasing and not diminishing, although there has been a slightly greater increase of population than of illiteracy relatively during the decade from 1870 to 1880 in the country as a whole.

Fifth. That in many parts of the country conditions are growing rapidly worse rather than better, and that the evil is of that peculiar nature that the local power and disposition to apply the remedy grows less as the necessity for it increases.

Sixth. That the danger to the country is everywhere, although the disease may be largely local; that ignorance anywhere circulates everywhere and poisons the political and social life of each State and of the whole people.

Seventh. That the remedy must be applied by those who perceive the danger; that if there is anywhere indifference to the remedy it proves that there is the more occasion for its use, and that the insensibility of the patient requires at once such measures on the part of those still in relatively sound health as will prevent the spreading of the plague; and that the cry of physicians and nurses for help should control our action rather than the convulsions or the stolidity of the patient.

Eighth. But in this case there is neither indifference nor stolidity; there is simply an inability to combat the plague unaided and a cry of distress. Ignorance is worse in a republic than the pestilence.

Ninth. That the exceptional degree of illiteracy prevailing in some parts of the country as it constitutes a common danger so it is the result historically of causes for which the whole country is responsible; and that those portions of the land which have been free from the immediate presence of the institution to which we trace the evil are not without participation in the guilt, as well as the lucre, which appertained to it.

That everywhere the pharisee business is played out and the prayer of the publican is in order.

Tenth. Those parts of the country where there is least illiteracy have as a rule received already very largely pecuniary assistance from sources which originated in fortunate location and the wise providence of those who lived before them; and that there is justice in the request for help made by those whose ancestors acquired and defended the soil whereon these happy millions and glorious institutions now repose in prosperity and strength.

Eleventh. That there is no State or Territory in the Union where the facilities for common-school education should not be greatly increased, and none where twice the amount of expenditure and effort now going on might not profitably be made.

Twelfth. That local taxation is very heavy, falling chiefly upon homesteads and visible personal property and the estates of those least able to bear taxation, which should come from the surplus of society and not from its primary means of existence, while the national income is derived mainly from things either better not consumed at all, and therefore the more heavily taxed the better still, because there will be the less of that harm which comes from consumption, or from articles paid for by those who have the surplus earnings and accumulated wealth of society.

Thirteenth. That since, at the present time, national taxation is far less burdensome to the masses of the people, upon whom falls much more heavily the weight of the support of State and local institutions, and also since the existence of the nation is as much imperiled by ignorance as the perpetuity of the States, therefore the common good requires the appropriation of national aid to the support and maintenance of common schools.

Fourteenth. That this aid should be distributed in such way and should so long continue as is necessary, in order to equalize the facilities for common-school education, and to once elevate the status of the masses of the community to a high standard of intelligence, at which point and after which the community would, in self-defense and from the instinct which inclines men to keep a good when they possess it, be sure to educate itself sufficiently without national help. This is proved: That systems of education are best supported and most firmly fixed in the most intelligent States. Those States would as soon surrender their liberties as their schools. They are synonymous.

I now pass to consider the ability of the different sections to bear taxation. The ability of communities to bear taxation is not in proportion to their relative total wealth or property. But there must first be deducted as properly exempt from any imposition so much property and producing power as is necessary to subsistence, and taxation can not be sustained except upon the surplus remaining, if any. The valuation per capita of the New England States is $661; of the Middle States, $473; of the Western States, $334; of the Territories, $211; of the Southern States, $155; of the colored population, not over $5; average of whole country, $337.

But the ability to bear taxation depends upon producing power at the time the levy is made as much as upon accumulated property, for property will not sell and consequently can not pay unless producing forces are active.

The census shows that from 1870 to 1880 in the States of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, and Tennessee, thirteen States, there was a net loss in valuation of $202,868,844. In Texas there was a gain of $170,631,586; in Georgia, $12,253,080; North Carolina, $25,721,580; total, $208,606,246. Consequently the total loss of valuation in the other ten States enumerated was the enormous sum of $411,475,090 in ten years.

Bear in mind these are not the ten years during which the slaves were liberated. These were the ten years between 1870 and 1880.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him if it is not possible that that difference or shrinkage of value in some of the Southern States is accounted for by the difference in the value of money in the census reports, being currency in 1870 and gold in 1880?

Mr. BLAIR. I can not say in regard to that. That is an open question upon which everybody can draw his own inference. But during the same time in the country at large, as the Senator knows, the aggregate valuation, which undoubtedly was made upon the same substantial basis in all parts of the country, very nearly doubled. It went from sixteen billion to thirty billion dollars or more, if I recollect aright. I will not vouch for the figures, but I think it was from sixteen to thirty billion dollars, the actual values. The Senator will observe, too, that in three of the States enumerated there was an actual increase: in North Carolina of $25,000,000, in Texas of $170,000,000, and in Georgia of $12,000,000. I apprehend that the valuation is substantially on the same basis.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How do you account for it?

Mr. BLAIR. I account for it in the actual diminution in the cash value of the property in those States, if the figures are worth anything.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But how do you account for it?

Mr. BLAIR. From the general influences that operated in that section of the country. I think the data before the country very plainly show in most of these same States a quickening and revival in the business tendencies and in the business activity of the people and a general inclination to the investment of capital from abroad. The people are turning their attention to industrial questions, and very rapidly. The face of the South is being transformed, and the old poetic quotation will come in one of these days; the South will really bud and blossom as the rose, and that before a great while. But between the years 1870 and 1880 we all know the condition of the Southern country, and I do not think I could elucidate the subject in such a way that it would be better understood than the honorable Senator from Vermont and others already understand it.

The lack of education among the masses of the people is undoubtedly one more reason why property depreciated; perhaps the greatest reason was the absence of schools, and that was one cause why Northern immigration failed to find its home in the South rather than in the West. If there is anything that a Northern man or a Northern family wants, it is a chance to educate the children; it will not go where there are no schools. It is only primarily by the establishment of schools that that portion of the country can avail itself of the natural tendencies to immigration in that direction, either of individuals or of capital largely.

The decrease in the losing States varied from 45 to 78 per cent. I call attention to the thread of what I was saying, showing a decrease in the valuation in ten of those States of $411,000,000. During the same ten years the increase of population was 4,006,982, which is I suppose at least 30 per cent. on the population of the same thirteen States in 1870.

Ignorance and poverty procreate faster than intelligence and wealth.

Again, ability to bear taxation for a certain purpose will depend upon the other existing demands for the application of revenue. In a great section of our country the fixed capital, the houses, structures of all kinds for residence and business of every description, highways, and other means of transportation, &c., were lately destroyed by fire and sword, and when for that reason they have to be replaced or must be produced as a primary condition to existence and advancement for any reason, the taxation, such as poor and struggling communities can bear, must be greatly absorbed in these uses. A community has certain primary physical necessities like an individual, and as he must eat before he learns to read, so the community must provide for some things even before it provides completely for the intellectual culture of its children; hence it would be expected for all these causes that the people in the Southern States would be able to pay far less for the support of common schools than other portions of the American people. Yet, as a fact, they pay in proportion to their valuation as much and in proportion to their capacity to be taxed a great deal more for the education of their children. It is not a question of effort, but of strength.

The rate per cent. of school to total taxation is, in New England, 20.2 per cent.; Middle States, 19.5 per cent.; Western States, 26.6 per cent.; Territories, 22.4 per cent.; Southern States, 20.1 per cent.; average, whole country, 22.6 per cent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean on the total valuation?

Mr. BLAIR. No, the percentage of school taxation to the entire amount of taxation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To a fixed ratio.

Mr. BLAIR. Taking the entire taxation of the country and dividing that taxation into groups, the New England States, the Middle States, the Western States, the Territories, and the Southern States. In New England 20.2 per cent. of all taxation is given to education, to schools.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That percentage of the total for all purposes?

Mr. BLAIR. Of the amount of all taxes raised and collected. For instance, where there is $100,000 raised in any given community in New England, $20,200 of that $100,000 is applied to schools; in the Middle States, $19,500 of the $100,000 is applied to schools; in the Western States, $26,600 is applied to schools; in the Territories, $22,400 is applied to schools; in the Southern States, $20,100 is applied to schools; and the average for the whole country of every $100,000 of taxation is $22,600. It has a very important bearing on the merits of the proposition that this table be understood.

I now proceed to consider the increase of educational expenditure required. I have not dared to make these calculations up to what I think they really should be; they are the minimum. The education of children is a business just as much as the running of a government, or a line of transportation, or the raising of crops. A plant is first required. The child, ignorant of his letters, is the raw material; and, in theory at least, the young man or woman instructed in the rudiments of knowledge and skilled in the primary arts for its acquisition is the manufactured article.

Falling back upon the returns of the Bureau of Education of 1881, the latest and most reliable we have, and bearing in mind all that I have said in the early part of my remarks of the increase since that time and the enlarged proportions of the problem we are dealing with, I ask attention to the following facts:

In 1881 there were children of the school ages in the United States not enrolled, that is, not attending at all anywhere in public or private schools, 6,030,936.

I will here state that educators complain everywhere that they lack accommodations for those who are actually enrolled. There are no school-houses for their accommodation. In fact there are not sittings for more than are enrolled anywhere. A school-house for fifty pupils can not cost less than $300. We have, then, a necessity for increase of school-houses 120,567, and of teachers at least the same number. The houses would cost $36,170,100; if you fit the teachers with one year of instruction, at $250, $30,141,850; teachers' wages for three-months' school, at $30, boarding themselves, about 50 cents per day—one-third pay of diggers of ditches and short drains—$10,854,930; cost of books, which must be paid for by some one, $180,782; total, $77,347,662, to provide the plant and run it three months for the instruction of the children not now attending school at all in this country.

Take now the seventeen Southern States, including the District of Columbia. There were not-enrolled children of school ages returned to the bureau in the year 1881, 2,873,399; school-houses and teachers required, 57,465; cost of houses, at $300 each, $17,239,500; cost of fitting teachers, at $250 one year, $14,366,250; pay for three months, wages at $30 per month, teacher paying board, $5,172,750; school-books, $86,148—a total cost to provide for and instruct for three months the children not now enrolled in public or private schools $36,864,648, of which $31,692,898 is necessary before the schools could begin.

Now, all this done, in addition to what already exists north and south, the country would be only tolerably supplied with a school plant, the repair and reproduction of which, with constant increase of investment to perform properly the increasing educational work, must be provided for.

But it should be borne in mind that a school of three months leaves nine months of the year in which to forget what has been learned in the three. Many schools are far less in duration, and consist of but a single term during the year, some not more than three or four weeks, in fact. These averages are pernicious, inasmuch as it is like an effort to divide the crime or misery of the country according to population, and say that each person suffers 25 per cent. from cancer, or is three-fourths a lunatic, or 50 per cent. a murderer. But it is the best we can do, and in no event are we likely fully to grasp the tremendous significance of the solid facts. The schools in my opinion should be six months yearly, and be divided in two terms. That is enough; and the rest of the time of youth should be given to industrial improvement and recreation.

The actual yearly expenditures of all moneys for public schools in the whole country is at this time just about $80,000,000. I believe that to be a liberal estimate. Of this, in the sixteen Southern States, with the District of Columbia, there may be $14,000,000. In the year 1881 it was $13,359,784, as returned to the Commissioner of Education. The schools average about three months yearly.

If we deduct the $14,000,000 from $80,000,000 we have remaining as the expenditure in the rest of the country $66,000,000. As these Southern States have one-third the total population, in order to place that section upon an equality of privilege with the rest there should be, instead of $14,000,000, a yearly expenditure of $33,000,000 for her enrolled children, and none of these calculations make any provision for children not enrolled at all.

It is too low an estimate to say that in the North there should be an expenditure of $100,000,000 at once to increase school facilities, provide and qualify teachers for their work, and at least as much more in the South, or in the whole country, $200,000,000. Upon the present basis of expenditure in the North there would be $100,000,000 annually paid for the support of public schools in the whole country. If one-third the children are now unenrolled and unprovided for, there should be an increase in yearly expenditure of $50,000,000 on their account. This would make the annual cost of our public schools only $150,000,000, and would give to all the children of the whole country but six months' training each year, and to teachers only the pay of common laborers or less.

The proposition of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN]—setting aside the source of supply from which he proposed to get the money which, would have a tendency to identify the support of the public schools with the prosperity of a business which I hope will yet disappear from the earth, which proposition was to appropriate about $80,000,000 yearly to schools—is really moderate when the necessities of the problem are fairly stated; and I take this occasion to say that the proposition of the Senator from Illinois divested of the objectionable feature referred to is worthy of a great statesman and far-seeing patriot. There is nothing the matter but our own failure to fully appreciate the stern requirements of the situation.

If fifty, eighty, or one hundred millions could be substituted for the fifteen millions proposed in this bill, and the whole distributed upon the basis of population, or of illiteracy, temporarily, it would be far better. But I have no hope of the adoption of such a measure, and the committee felt under the necessity of confining the amount to the comparative pittance of fifteen millions, which must necessarily, if not very largely increased, be confined to the dense clouds of ignorance where explosions are threatened; that is to say, it must be applied locally to the evil itself. In States which receive but little, comparatively little is wanted.

Even after $15,000,000 are divided upon the basis of illiteracy, the individual child will receive for his education in California, $15.12; in Colorado, $14.34; in Connecticut, $10.71; in Nevada, $14.40; in New Hampshire, $10.07; in Rhode Island, $11.36; in District of Columbia, $13.61, and in Massachusetts, $19.21.

While in Alabama he will receive $3.64; in Arkansas, $3.13; in Florida, $3.75; in Georgia, $4.03; in Kentucky, $3.67; in Louisiana, $4.96; in Mississippi, $4.09; in Virginia, $3.94; in West Virginia, $4.31; in North Carolina, $3.26; in South Carolina, $5.05.

While the immediate need in these last States is at least for double the education called for in the first group.

This bill appropriates $15,000,000 the first year, and will give to every State and Territory $3 for each person over ten years of age who can not read, and $2.41 for each person who can not write, lessening in amount, that is according to the basis of distribution, $1,000,000 yearly for ten years, when all payments are to cease.

The State will apply the funds and render a yearly account of the manner in which the work is done. The Executive, if dissatisfied, can withhold further expenditures, subject to the action of Congress.

Each State and Territory must expend for school purposes at least one-third the amount received during the first five years and an equal amount the second five years of the operation of the bill if it should become a law.

States receiving small amounts can expend the same for normal instruction, teachers' institutes, or otherwise, as they prefer. The amount that New Hampshire receives, for instance, would increase her normal school facilities more than threefold beyond the present expenditure of the State, or give 59 cents yearly to persons of school age.

The funds must be applied to schools and not to structures, not exceeding one-tenth to the qualification of teachers, which is the first necessity. The States are required to so use the fund as to bring about an actual equalization of school advantages to all children alike. Industrial education is provided for when practicable, which will be but seldom, although something may be done in suitable localities and in the way of beginning.

We are a great way deeper in the mire than we realize when we talk of doing much in the way of teaching trades and occupations before our children can half of them find a chance to learn to read. But it will come in time, and a beginning can now be made in the way of setting out a few young trees.

The Territories are of the utmost importance, and the bill undertakes to provide for them indispensable legislation, both in appropriations and administration.

The method of expenditure in the States is the same substantially which has already been adopted by the Senate in the passage of the bill establishing a national school fund from the proceeds of the sale of public lands, &c. As both parties have already indorsed that method of expenditure on more than one occasion, the committee, or at least a majority of its members, have thought best to avoid all chance for controversy on that subject by adopting that which, having been repeatedly sanctioned, can not now be repudiated with consistency.

I also embrace this fitting opportunity to say that I fully believe that the States will everywhere disburse the moneys received under this bill, if it becomes a law, in good faith and with as sacred regard to the demands of prudence and honor in one section of the country as in the other. For a year or two there may be some possible confusion in setting up and testing machinery, but in the existing condition of the public mind the better way is to give outright to the States and hold them, as they desire to be held, to an undivided responsibility, to be redeemed upon their honor. We shall not trust to that honor in vain.

Mr. President, the absolute necessities of this nation and of these States, of their darkened present and of their portentous future, demand the appropriation of public money from a full Treasury to aid in the establishment and support of common schools throughout the country.

Sir, I appeal to the facts, and entreat the Senate to pass this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. The termination of the Senator's speech has left the Senate, I think, unprepared to vote upon this matter without further discussion. I think there are other Senators who desire possibly to be heard upon the measure that he has brought before the Senate. I am not one of them; but I think that there should be the opportunity for discussion, and the accident of the moment seems to have prevented that by the absence of Senators. I move, therefore, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that no action will be taken which will prevent this bill from coming up as the unfinished business to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An adjournment will leave it the unfinished business.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say that there is not the slightest disposition——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will consent, I think, to withdraw the motion.

Mr. BAYARD. I withdraw the motion to adjourn for the purpose of an explanation of the existing condition of business.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say that there is not any disposition on the part of the committee, certainly none on the part of myself, to prevent a full discussion of this bill. I know that several Senators desire to speak upon it. It is quite apparent, without its being said that the elements which must enter into the discussion, the examination of data, and all that appertains to wise legislation, where $15,000,000 of immediate expenditure and an accruing expenditure of over $100,000,000 are concerned, require careful thought and consideration on the part of the Senate. But it will be remembered that this measure came before the last Congress, and that there has been for years great urgency for action. It should be known either that there is or that there is not to be national aid to common schools. The attention of the country is turned in this direction, and has been for years. If the aid is not to be extended, they should know it in those communities where they are hoping for it, so as to fall back upon themselves. Therefore, I shall urge the consideration of this bill as rapidly as is consistent with thoroughness and propriety of action. I would not like to consent to its being displaced by any other bill on the Calendar. There are several Senators who I have no doubt will occupy the day to-morrow; and perhaps it is best that we should adjourn now.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to ask leave that the Committee on Patents may have printed for its use two hundred and fifty copies of some testimony taken before it in a hearing upon the bills relating to patent suits which are pending before the Senate. I do not know that it is necessary to put it in the form of a written motion; if it is, I will do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that it be at this time ordered that two hundred and fifty copies of the testimony taken before the Committee on Patents, relating to patent bills pending before the Senate, be printed for the use of the committee. Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the motion the Chair asks unanimous consent to say that it is quite probable he will be obliged to be absent to-morrow, and the Chair names the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to occupy the chair in his absence for the next three days. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate adjourn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour for the call of committees for reports has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill. Pending that motion I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph of said bill and all amendments thereto be limited to thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the motion to limit debate.

Mr. CURTIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to make a report.

The SPEAKER. But there is a motion pending before the House.

Mr. CURTIN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will permit me to make this report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], but I am acting under instructions of the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to withdraw his motion. The question is first on the motion to limit debate.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 61, noes 56.

Mr. DEUSTER. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DEUSTER and Mr. TOWNSHEND were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 93, noes 56.

Mr. DEUSTER (one of the tellers). I will not insist on a further count.

So (no further count being called for) the motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the question on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, if there be no objection the Chair will lay before the House sundry executive communications.

There was no objection.

UNLAWFUL FENCING OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CURTIN. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DEUSTER and Mr. TOWNSHEND were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 89, noes 75.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The bill last under consideration and now pending in Committee of the Whole is the Post-Office appropriation bill. All debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto has been limited to thirty minutes. The Clerk will report the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 4002 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows: In line 21 of said section strike out the word "less" and in lieu thereof insert the word "more."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that on this paragraph points of order were reserved by several gentlemen.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to be heard on the point of order. I think the provision just read is clearly subject to a point of order under the third clause of Rule XXI. The section of the Revised Statutes referred to—the second clause of section 4002—provides what shall be the compensation of railways for carrying the mails and how that compensation shall be determined. The first provision is that railways carrying their whole length a daily average of two hundred pounds of mail matter shall receive not more than $50 per mile per annum, and then the rates of pay decrease in proportion to the increased amounts of mail matter carried. The section then provides—

The average weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, at such times after June 30, 1873, and not less frequently than once in four years—

So that the rate of compensation now provided by the statute which is proposed to be amended is so much per pound, according to the weight of matter carried, which is to be determined by weighings made not less frequently than once in four years. And this provision, under a proper construction, would authorize these weighings to be made, in a sound executive discretion, more frequently than once in four years.

Now, the clause of this bill upon which I make my point of order proposes to amend this section of the statutes by striking out the word "less" and inserting the word "more," taking away the executive discretion to weigh more frequently than once in four years. If this clause of the bill be enacted the weighing must be once in four years and not oftener.

Now, Rule XXI, in clause 3 (with which the Chair is familiar), provides that upon a general appropriation bill no provision changing existing law shall be in order unless it retrenches expenditures in one of three ways. I will read the language:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures—

by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States—

That is one mode of reduction—

by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States—

That is another method—

or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Now, the pending provision of this bill, as it proposes to change existing law, must, to be in order, not only retrench expenditures, but must do so in one of the three modes specified by the rule. It is true that under a subsequent clause of Rule XXI an amendment reported by a committee properly charged with the subject-matter of the amendment would be in order if it retrenched expenditures in any way; but the power of the Committee on Appropriations to propose for the consideration of the House in a general appropriation bill provisions changing existing law is confined to such propositions as shall retrench expenditures in some one of the three ways specified.

It is not necessary for me to take any considerable time in referring to the construction which this rule has always received. The first construction that it had was by Mr. Kerr, a former Speaker of this House, who held that the retrenchment or economy must be in one of the methods prescribed by the rule, and further, that it must appear upon the face of the provision proposed to be incorporated in the law that it does retrench expenditures in one of the ways specified in the rule. The construction thus laid down by Mr. Speaker Kerr has been followed from that time to this—that if it is necessary to resort to argument in order to show a retrenchment of expenditures the provision at once becomes subject to the point of order.

Now let us apply that test to the provision of the present bill. Can the Chair say that this provision upon its face retrenches expenditures in any one of the three ways designated by the rule? If the Chair can do this, the power of the Chair to discern retrenchment is greater than mine. Gentlemen may argue that it retrenches expenditures; I may disagree (and I would do so if the merits of the proposition were now in question); that it does not retrench, but is extravagant in its tendency—would lead to great abuses and great harm to the Department. But I prefer at this time to rest fairly upon the point of order that this provision does not upon its face retrench expenditures in either of the three ways provided by the rule and is a change of existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I concede, Mr. Chairman, that this provision, to be in order under the rule, must, upon its face or from facts within the official knowledge of the presiding officer, accomplish in one of the three ways named some reduction of expenditures; and in this instance the retrenchment would have to be by a "reduction of the compensation of some person paid out of the Treasury of the United States" or by the "reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill." The Chair will of course take official knowledge of the fact that the Post-Office Department is one in which the expenditures are constantly increasing at a greater or less per cent. each successive year. It is not necessary, therefore, I take it, under this provision of the rule, that the reduction shall be upon the basis of some former appropriation; it is sufficient if there be a reduction upon the basis of what would be the appropriation in the absence of this provision in the pending bill; because otherwise we could never show upon the face of this bill an absolute reduction in comparison with expenditures for the current fiscal year, as the business of the Department in all its branches is steadily increasing.

Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to state exactly the extent to which the expenditures contemplated by this bill are reduced by this provision from the fact I have named. But there is a fact upon which I think this proposition may rest, and it is this: The Chair will take official knowledge of the current expenditures of this Government. He will know in his official capacity just as a judge upon the bench knows officially a fact of which he will take cognizance even in the absence of proof. The Chair will take official notice of the fact that the weighing of the mail will inevitably, according to the ordinary course of proceeding of the Government, increase the cost of the expenditure of carrying on the service. If the Chair takes official knowledge of that fact, of course the decision of this question is easy. The Chair will then take official knowledge of the fact that the frequent weighings of the mail, not only weighing once in four years but as often as the gentleman having charge of this branch of the service thinks proper—that these frequent weighings of the mails do increase the expenses of the Government. That is a fact within the knowledge of the presiding officer of this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I ask, then, why the Chair may not on this official knowledge hold that the amendment in prohibiting these weighings of the mail—which do increase expense to the Government—oftener than once in four years does to that extent retrench expenditures and bring it within the meaning of the rule.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, this is an important point of order; important because of its effect upon the present bill, and it is highly important it should be decided right, so that we may have a precedent worthy to be followed hereafter. It will be a pure matter of speculation to work out in any way a theory that will show, by the incorporation of section 2 into this bill, it will retrench expenditures. It may be, in the weighing of the mails, that it would be highly important for the Government to have the right in the discretion of the Postmaster-General to weigh the mails oftener than once in four years, as there are many roads upon which the mails are carried and lines over which they may be carried from which they may be transferred to other lines of road, and thus after a time the cost of carrying the mail may be increased to the public. Instances have been given where the weight has been reduced one-half or more by the establishment of new and competing lines of railroad. And still the Government, while paying for the carrying of mails which went by the old line, would be paying also on the new line. On that principle and theory and for that purpose was the old law framed.

I think it is fair and reasonable to say that this provision of the law which provides for the weighing of the mail at least once in four years is largely in the interest of the Government, but I dispute the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that to weigh only every four years would be in the interest of the Government. The proposition is to strike out of section 4002 of the Revised Statutes the word "less" and in lieu thereof to insert the word "more," the effect of which would be to provide that the mails should not be weighed oftener than once in four years. It may be under the present law the mails must be weighed once in four years; that is the proposition and that is the law as I understand it. Gentlemen must reason out and speculate on this in order to arrive at a conclusion that it would be economy to the Government to change this statute. But if it were possible—and we deny it is possible with any sort of certainty—if it were possible it would not bring this section of the bill within the rule, as has been well stated by my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. I will not read the whole of paragraph 3 of Rule XXI. The first sentence of that paragraph prohibits new legislation on general appropriation bills. That is wise. We are charged with various subjects of legislation which come before the House, and it is wise that the Committee on Appropriations should be inhibited from running into general legislation. It has always been vicious and always dangerous. We have had some marked examples in the last seven or eight years. Then follows what is intended to be an exception:

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States.

That is the first provision of that sentence. It has always been a matter of doubt whether a subject of purely general legislation on an appropriation bill could be said to be germane to the appropriations in such bill because they happened to be related to the same general subject. We are here making appropriations for the purpose of carrying on the Post-Office Department. The subject-matter of this bill is an appropriation bill relating to the Post-Office Department. Here we propose legislation which changes the time of the weighing of the mails. We think that is not the subject-matter of the Post-Office appropriation bill. It may relate to post-office matters, but not to appropriation matters, and certainly, so far as that provision of the rule is concerned, that it must be germane, would not admit of this section of the bill.

Now we come to the second:

> By the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The second section of the bill clearly has no reference to the compensation of any person whose salary comes out of the Treasury of the United States; and I am very much surprised to hear the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who is so well versed in all of these matters, claim, that in any sense of the word it comes within that provision. Now, as to the last clause:

> Or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

And I beg your attention to this latter clause, for there can be no possibility of this section being in order under either of the others. If it is in order at all it must be under this branch of the rule.

It will be borne in mind that this section of the bill, the second section, now under consideration, will not affect the amount of money appropriated by the bill a single dollar. So that it can not be claimed that it comes within the clause I have just read, and I read it again:

> Or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

There is nothing in this section which reduces the amounts of money appropriated by the bill a single copper. So in no sense can it be said to be in order under the rule.

It has been wisely stated, and I think very early after this clause of the rule was adopted by the House, that a provision in the nature of new legislation, in order that it shall be held to be within the rule, must be something that affirmatively shows a reduction of expenditures. It must not be a matter of mere speculation, not a matter of opinion, not a matter of doubt which might exist in the minds of members or in the mind of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole. It must be something tangible, as has been held long ago, and the decisions are, I think, uniform in that regard. It is something that must be clear upon its face, clear within itself, and not a matter that may be worked out by some method of reasoning.

This section in my judgment is clearly subject to the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that the point of order has been made with reference to this section, and especially so as coming from the gentleman from Ohio. There can not be a doubt that in the spirit and letter of this rule it was intended as a provision to reach just such cases as this. This changes the law which relates to the support of the Post-Office Department. We know by experience, for we have a notorious instance of it, that by the reweighing of the mails the Government has almost always been the sufferer, and in the instance to which I have alluded the Government absolutely lost, I think, $800,000, or at any rate some enormous sum of money. Under that reweighing system the newspapers were carried and paid for. It is to meet that particular case and to prevent its recurrence that this provision is incorporated. And it is as notorious a fact as any other fact connected with the history of the support of the Post-Office Department that this constant reweighing of the mails has always been an injury and an expense to the Government. I did not suppose really that there would have been, in the presentation of this subject, anything else than perfect unanimity of sentiment in order to correct the wrong that I speak of.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me a moment? It has been suggested to me by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] that the saving of the expense of reweighing alone, which is largely done by the Government, will be of itself a reduction of expenditures. I do not say how much, but it necessarily costs something to reweigh the mails, and to that extent there will be a reduction of expenditures. It saves, therefore, the expense of reweighing without any reference to the ultimate reduction.

Mr. RANDALL. The amount of money to be paid for the weighing of the mails is embraced in this bill for the current year. You can not weigh them for nothing. Hence, you not only almost always lose money by this reweighing, but the Government has to pay for it. It costs more money to weigh the mails every year than it would to weigh them once in four years.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed with reference to Rule XXI that three clauses are specified, the first two of which are much more narrow and circumscribed than the last. The arguments of the gentleman from Ohio and my colleague from Illinois were based upon the second proposition, which confines amendments of this character to instances where the reduction will be obtained in the compensation of the persons paid out of the Treasury or by the reductions of the amount carried by the bill. These gentlemen failed to read the third proposition of this clause, the proviso which was intended to give control to the two others. But it seems that the rule had been made down to the proviso, and the House was then of opinion that it was too narrow and circumscribed, and in order to give power to the Committee on Appropriations to meet just such emergencies the proviso was added, which declared that it should be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, and I ask gentlemen to mark this language—

Which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague allow me right there? This is not the report of a committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of this change of law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am coming to that point; for the gentleman made that point when addressing the Chair. Now, what does the Committee on Appropriations have jurisdiction of? Taking the definition given by the gentlemen who have addressed the Chair on the point of order, the jurisdiction is ample and complete upon all appropriations providing for the postal service.

Now, to what does this amendment relate? It relates to compensation which shall be allowed the railway companies for carrying mails. It provides the basis upon which their compensation can be fixed.

Mr. BINGHAM. A railway is not a "person," and your rule speaks of the reduction of the compensation "of any person."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] misunderstands the proviso to the rule. The proviso says any amendment is in order which shall retrench expenditures, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

As I said a moment ago, nothing can be more intimately related to or more directly connected with the jurisdiction of the committee over appropriations than this very clause; for it fixes the basis upon which the appropriations are to be made. It seems to me there is no question about the jurisdiction of the committee.

Now let us come to the question as to whether this does retrench expenditures. And I must express my surprise that both gentlemen who have addressed the Chair in support of the point of order have taken the position before the House that this will not retrench expenditures. Why, the notable instance mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] must be fresh in the recollection of all here. And there is another notable instance he has not alluded to. I refer to the instance where Postmaster-General James allowed a reweighing of mails—it is charged, I do not know as to the truth of the charge, to accommodate New York newspapers.

Mr. CANNON. No, sir.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes; there are two instances complained of by the press of this country, and it was discussed in this House to my recollection; the statement being that there were grave abuses practiced under the administration of Postmaster-General James, the charge being that he, under the inspiration of some of the New York dailies, was induced to cause the mails on the roads from New York to Philadelphia to be reweighed, so that the railroad companies might put on a fast train for carrying the mails to Philadelphia so as to allow the New York publishers to get their papers earlier into Philadelphia. In the administration of that same Postmaster-General, in obedience to the request of a man I believe by the name of Smith, Emory Smith, connected with the Philadelphia press, the abuse that was mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] occurred where there was a reweighing of the mails from Philadelphia to Harrisburg, and in consequence from $800,000 to $1,000,000 was lost by the Treasury to enable the railroad company to furnish a fast-mail train for the Philadelphia papers to reach Harrisburg.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not matter as regards the point of order whether it is an abuse or not; the point is that it cost more money.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I venture this assertion: I do not say every instance of reweighing has resulted in increased compensation for carrying the mail, for I am not familiar enough with that point to know. But I never heard an instance mentioned before my colleague [Mr. CANNON] suggested there were such instances. He is the only one I ever heard assert that the reweighing of the mails ever resulted in the reduction of the cost of compensation. I supposed it was a well-known fact that it was only necessary to go to the Post-Office Department and examine the records to find in almost every instance, if not every instance, it has resulted in large losses to the Treasury. But, as was said by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the Chair must take cognizance of the official action of the Department as well as the law. The official action of the Department is in one sense the law. It is in pursuance of the law. It is of such a nature as the Chair in my judgment must take cognizance of.

I am satisfied the Chair cannot entertain a shadow of doubt as to this point of order. There is not a scintilla of doubt that this amendment to this bill will work great retrenchment to the Treasury and will accomplish the very purpose for which that proviso was annexed to this rule.

But I do not wish to consume time in discussing this question further. This section is so evidently in the line of retrenchment and falls so clearly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations under the proviso of the third clause of Rule XXI, that I do not think it necessary to waste further time in discussing the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I did not intend to add another word to what I said a few moments ago, and I should not have done so if it had not been for the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and my colleague from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] have seen proper to wander away from the merits of the point of order and to discuss from a one-sided view the question as to whether there was economy in the proposed section or not. Now, if I can have the attention of the Chair, I will read a brief abstract of the first decision that was ever made upon this question:

In the decision of Speaker Kerr on the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department it was held that the amendment, to be in order, must clearly on its face and in affirmative terms reduce expenditures; that it must not, as a matter of speculation or calculation, assume that, but must actually retrench by specific results.

And I undertake to say the current of authority is in line with that precedent established by the first decision made by Speaker Kerr under this rule.

Now one word as to the argument of the gentleman from Illinois that this would retrench expenditures. Mind you, my point is, the very minute you have to commence to argue that there is retrenchment, the very minute that it does not stand out plainly upon the very face of the provision itself, that very minute you confess it is subject to the point of order. And I only proceed to argue that the proposed section does not retrench expenditures because it is fair to this side of the House and fair to myself that I should say a word in reply to the assumptions of my colleague.

In the first place, one would suppose from the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that it was the custom of the Department to reweigh the mails oftener than once in four years. I say such is not the custom, and I speak advisedly; it has been done in very rare instances. It may be that in one instance, when Postmaster-General James was in charge of the Post-Office Department, the mails were reweighed on the Pennsylvania Central Railroad for the purpose of getting an early morning train to accommodate the Philadelphia press, when under a sound executive discretion he ought not to have done so. But I apprehend gentlemen can find no other instance.

But even suppose it was so. The law fixes the compensation for carrying the mails at so much per pound. If it was practicable to weigh the mails every day and to pay for the exact number of pounds carried, that would be exact justice and equity under the law. Although this executive discretion may have been abused by Postmaster-General James, the Government, even by such alleged abuse, never paid one cent for mails which were not in fact carried.

Let me give the argument on the other side as gentlemen have presented it on their side. Take the New York Central Railroad, for instance; last week that road put on a fast train which carries nothing but the mails. There are three or four roads that run west from New York city—the Pennsylvania Central, the Erie, the Baltimore and Ohio, and the New York Central. The statute provides that for the first two hundred pounds of mail carried on each of these roads the pay shall be $50 per mile per annum, and for all amounts over 5,000 pounds the pay shall only be $25 a ton per mile per annum; that is, $50 a mile for the first two hundred pounds, and $25 a mile for each 2,000 pounds where the mail exceeds 5,000 pounds.

Now, it is clear economy to mass the bulk of the mails on the New York Central or any other road that will take them, and the present Postmaster-General does well when he gets a special mail-train on that road that carries nothing but the mails, and which may amount to thirty, fifty, or one hundred thousand pounds, as he gets it carried at the rate of $25 a ton of 2,000 pounds per mile per annum.

Suppose that the New York Central should refuse to run that special mail-train after a weighing, while it carries the bulk of same, then the mails would be divided up between it and the other lateral lines. Yet the New York Central would, under the proposed amendment, get the large pay for four years, while it would only carry a small amount of the mails, and the Postmaster-General would be powerless to readjust its pay for four years.

I say again, under the proposed amendment of the law, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] says is clearly in the line of economy, the New York Central might throw off the mails a month after the weighing, and it would then, under this proposed amendment, get pay for four years at an exceedingly high rate, and would not carry one-fourth of the mail which it carries on these special trains. That is the hole which gentlemen seek to put the country into. Why? Because they allege that Postmaster-General James at one time violated sound executive discretion in the reweighing of the mails in one instance. The power of impeachment lies against officers when they violate duties and do so willfully. And the power of public opinion is ever ready to operate upon them.

Now, when gentlemen set their faces and make haste, without sufficient knowledge or study of the law, to make these radical changes on an appropriation bill in the name of economy, they are very apt to be like the bull in the china-shop—they make a great deal of noise and do a great deal of damage.

I beg pardon of the Chair for having discussed the merits of this question, and would not have done so except that it was due to myself in answer to the arguments made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read what was formerly Rule CXX.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision in any such bill, or amendment thereto, changing existing law, be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will observe that that rule is much broader in its scope than the present rule, so far as relates to the power of committees to report provisions in appropriation bills changing existing law. That proposition was placed in the rules on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. Subsequently, there being much discontent on account of the legislation incorporated in appropriation bills, the rules were modified on motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], and paragraph 3 of the present Rule XXI was then adopted and has been in operation ever since.

It will be observed that under the present rule, unless coming from a committee, there are but three ways in which legislation changing existing law can be had on appropriation bills. The Chair will read that portion of the rule:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of the amounts of money covered by the bill.

The point to which the legislation embraced in this bill is addressed is of this character: it is alleged that the discretionary power of reweighing the mails oftener than once in four years has been abused, that the weighings have not only been too frequent, but have often been made for some other purposes than to ascertain the weight of mails or to do equity toward the railroad companies. This, perhaps, is true. But the attention of the Chair is forced back to the three methods in which the reduction to be accomplished by new legislation must be done under the rule. Does this provision reduce "the number or salary of officers of the United States?" This is not claimed by any one. Does it reduce "the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States?" This does not appear. The Chair recognizes the fact that the railroad companies are artificial persons and may be included in the word "persons." But there is nothing in this bill which indicates that there is to be a reweighing and that there are appropriations here which would be reduced by reason of it. The Chair can not assume, and there is no indication from any reports or anything else which the Chair could recognize, that there is to be a reweighing, and the railroad companies by reason of it would get more under this bill in the next fiscal year than they will receive if the proposed legislation is adopted.

It is alleged by the gentleman from Illinois that the provision is in order by reason of the following proviso of Rule XXI:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The question here arises, what committee has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of this legislation? What committee is charged with the recommendation of this legislation? Rule XI provides that—

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rules as follows, namely: Subjects relating—

To the post-office and post-roads, other than appropriations for their support, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

It is very clear to the mind of the Chair the legislation here proposed is of such character as the rules would require to be considered by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; therefore the Committee on Appropriations could have no jurisdiction of this legislation under this proviso of the rule, and it is not in order under this proviso.

The Chair would not go so far as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and claim that the provision does not in fact retrench expenditures. The Chair is satisfied from an examination of official reports that annually there are weighings on certain routes in excess of the period of four years, and that under this provision there would be a reduction in the weighings. Whether or not it would be equitable to allow railroads to receive compensation for the carrying of a given amount of mail matter when the Department was conscious of the fact that the roads were transporting a larger quantity is a different question. The operation of the proviso might be inequitable, and yet it might reduce expenditures in that way. But such a reduction the Chair can not recognize in making this decision under the rules, and he therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I submit a pro forma amendment simply that I may express my opinion upon this bill. We shall soon be called upon to vote for or against it, and I am so much opposed to many of its provisions that I feel it my duty to state why I shall vote for it with reluctance.

I look upon this whole bill, Mr. Chairman, as the most niggardly appropriation of public money that we have been called upon to consider since I have been a member of Congress. In reading the bill before it was amended the first point to which my attention was called was the provision that no postmaster in the United States should receive a salary more than $4,000. That provision, I am aware, has been stricken out; but as it was expressive of the views of the Committee on Appropriations I think I am warranted in saying that when we come to consider the legislative appropriation bill we may expect that committee to be consistent with itself, and recommend that no one of the members on this floor shall receive a salary of more than $4,000. I contend from observation and experience that the administrative ability and executive talent necessary to administer successfully a large post-office is at least equivalent to the talents which are necessary to make a man prove himself an average Congressman.

When I read further in this bill I find a sweeping reduction of 50 per cent. upon the compensation of the railroad companies that have received land grants from the Government, excepting what is known as the Union Pacific combination. Now, Mr. Chairman, to my unprejudiced mind there would rise up in spite of me a suspicion that there was vicious legislation behind that clause; and I am more convinced of it from the fact that after the House had discussed that provision for some hours the great objector to the legislation of this House rises in his seat and presents an amendment to his own bill, so as to take in the very roads that he had excluded when framing the bill. This, I say, excited suspicion in my mind. I do not know what is behind it; I do not want to charge anybody with having a job in it or anything of that kind, but it was suspicious, to say the least, to have the framers of the bill include subsidized railroads after they had excluded them when framing the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me, for Indiana and Illinois have already consumed on this floor more time than the two States are able to pay for. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] declines to yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I can not yield; and I hope that this interruption will not be taken out of my time.

The next thing that I see, as I read this bill, is that there shall be an appropriation of $4,600,000 for star-route service and an additional imaginary appropriation of $1,000,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, where is that million of dollars? The Postmaster-General tells us distinctly that on June 30, 1883, there was $1,100,000 of surplus somewhere. Where has it been lying now for nine months? If the committee have found this $1,000,000 which they can appropriate as surplus, why did they not appropriate the whole $1,100,000, and reduce this appropriation to $4,500,000 instead of $4,600,000? What is to become of this other little surplus of $100,000 floating around in the Post-Office Department? To my mind there is covert legislation right there which I can not explain in any way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, reading still further I find that there is appropriated for railway post-office clerks $4,000,000. Last year we appropriated for this purpose $3,977,125. The officer of the Government charged with the distribution of this money says that he will require $4,295,259.60. He is either capable of saying exactly what he wants or he is the grandest fraud in the Post-Office Department. When any officer of the Government comes here and says, "I want an appropriation of several millions of dollars," and calculates the amount down to a single cent, it is the duty of this House, in my humble judgment, to give him every dollar he asks for.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then Congress ought to abdicate its powers entirely and give the power of appropriation to the Departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask unanimous consent to say a few words more.

Mr. CANNON. If the Chair will recognize me I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. Without losing my right to claim the floor hereafter, I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. AIKEN. The gentleman from Illinois said to me, why should Congress have anything to do with it if my suggestion be adopted? I think the Post-Office Department might be infinitely better off if the Congress of the United States had nothing to do with it, and that is my honest conviction. I say so for this reason: the whole power of the Committee on Appropriations has been exercised in this bill to appropriate less than the sum the Post-Office Department says is necessary. They have not considered maturely how to administer the Post-Office Department further than to say it will take less than the Postmaster-General says is necessary, and that same gentleman my friend from Illinois has taken a half-dozen occasions to extol upon this floor.

I see nothing in this bill, Mr. Chairman, appropriated for the fast-mail service. Why? For the simple reason it has not been asked for. That is the only reason which has been assigned. I will say here in passing that it is my honest conviction that if the whole of the American people were to vote on that question they would give half a million dollars to a fast line from the city of New York to ramify every part of this broad land. The humblest and the most ignorant man in sight of a railroad, when he sees the trains which carry the mails of the country flitting by faster than the wind of a cyclone, glories in the fact that intelligence is speeding throughout the land with such rapidity. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I say this Committee on Appropriations have not given us a dollar in this bill for this purpose simply because it has not been asked for by the Post-Office Department. If this committee refused to give because the Postmaster has not asked for it, why, in the name of common sense, do they object to giving when he does ask for it? [Applause on the Republican side.] That is an argument to prove to me this Post-Office Department would get along as well without Congress as Congress would without it. That species of niggardly legislation is manifest in every page of this bill, as has been proved by the amendments adopted by the House. It all shows conclusively to any right-thinking man that the purpose of the bill is to get up a cheap notoriety for grand economy. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I will now yield the floor.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 29 of the act of March 3, 1879 (United States Statutes at Large, page 362), be, and it is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"The provisions of the fifth and sixth sections of the act entitled 'An act establishing post-routes, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1877, for the transmission of official mail matter, be, and they are hereby, extended to all officers of the United States Government, not including members of Congress, the envelopes of such matter in all cases to bear appropriate indorsements, containing the proper designation of the office from which or officer from whom the same is transmitted, with a statement of the penalty for their misuse. And the provisions of said fifth and sixth sections are hereby likewise extended and made applicable to all official mail matter of the Smithsonian Institution: Provided, That any Department or officer authorized to use the penalty envelopes may inclose them with return address to any person or persons from whom official information is desired, the same to be used only to cover such official information: Provided further, That any letter or packet to be registered by either of the Executive Departments, or bureaus thereof, or by the Agricultural Department, may be registered without the payment of any registry fee; and any part-paid letter or packet addressed to either of said Departments or bureaus may be delivered free; but where there is good reason to believe the omission to prepay the full postage thereon was intentional, such letter or packet shall be returned to the sender: Provided further, That this act shall not extend or apply to pension agents or other officers who receive a fixed allowance as compensation for their services, including expenses of postages. And section 3915 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so far as the same relates to stamps and stamped envelopes for official purposes, is hereby repealed."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think that the gentleman from South Carolina could have heard the debate which occurred in this committee touching the lant-grant roads and the extension of the 50 per cent. clause to the Union Pacific Company. If he had he would not have indulged in the line of remarks which have just fallen from his lips.

Mr. AIKEN. I have heard enough for my own affliction. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I say the gentleman did not hear the discussion; I feel confident he could not have heard it, or else he misapprehended it. I do not complain that he condemns the reduction of transportation of the land-grant roads. That is his right to condemn. The gentleman understood very clearly the reason why the Committee on Appropriations had not embraced the Pacific roads under that head was because it was believed that subject could be better adjusted in the interest of the Government by leaving those roads subject only to the provision of the funding act. But the gentleman distinctly understood, if he listened to the debate, that the reason why finally the Pacific roads were placed under the same provision as the other land-grant roads was because the Committee of the Whole indicated a disposition not to discriminate between those two classes of roads.

The gentleman talks about this being covert. He talked about the covert purpose of this bill. I think gentlemen here owe it to themselves as well as to their constituents not only to consider but to discuss in a spirit of fairness all questions of public concern. Is there anything in the bill covert against the interests of the Government? Is there any effort on the part of the Committee of Appropriations to increase the expenses of the Government improperly? Have they brought forward a single provision the effect of which is not understood and known to every gentleman on this floor? Covert! Was it not known to every member of the committee and to this House that the Union Pacific road was omitted from the original provision? Was it not known to every member of the committee that upon a proper presentation of the facts, on my own motion, the Union Pacific road was brought within the 50 per cent. clause? Can the gentleman say there is anything covert in that?

Now, if anything is to be abhorred, it is the attempt on the part of any member of this House of Representatives or this committee to deceive his fellow-members. If in matters which concern the public welfare any man representing a constituency fails to act with that ingenuousness which becomes questions of public concern, I hope we may know it. I hope if the gentleman has discovered there is any hidden purpose in this bill to the wrong or injury of this Government, or to deceive any member of this House, or to deceive the country—if the whole thing is not patent on its face, I hope he will be more specific and definitely point out in what way any member of the House has sought to deceive the Committee of the Whole or the people of the country. Fairness and open dealing, and nothing short of that, becomes the duty of the Representatives of the people.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "not," in line 10 of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10 strike out the word "not;" so that if amended it will read:

"Extended to all officers of the United States Government, including members of Congress," &c.

Mr. REAGAN. This bill deals with the transmission of the mails; and this amendment, relating as it does to the clause under consideration, proposes to extend to members of Congress the privilege granted to heads of Departments and others.

Mr. HORR. Are you making it applicable to members of Congress?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir. Section 5 of the act of 1877, which is the foundation for the present amendment, provides:

That it shall be lawful to transmit through the mails free of postage any letters, packages, or other matters relating exclusively to the business of the Government of the United States: Provided, That every such letter or package, to entitle it to pass free, shall bear, over the words "official business," an indorsement showing also the name of the Department, and if from a bureau or office, the names of the Department and bureau or office, as the case may be, whence transmitted. And if any person shall make use of any such official envelope to avoid the payment of postage on his private letter, package, or other matter in the mail, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of $300, to be prosecuted in any court of competent jurisdiction.

The object of this provision of the bill was to enable the different Departments and the officers of the Government to send official mail matter free of postage, but under the statutory restriction which will prevent the abuse of the power of so sending. If the same statutory provisions are extended to the sending of official communications by members of Congress, including Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, it seems to me that there can be no just objection to it.

The item of postage to members of Congress is no insignificant one, as members will bear me out; and all that is paid for it comes out of their own pockets, they being in a condition to be taxed with that postage for the benefit of the public. If we receive official communications, whether large or small, from the Department to be transmitted to our constituents, no matter what the postage, we are forced to bear it; it is charged up against us. By striking out the word "not" in this section, so as to make it apply as well to members of the legislative department of the Government as to the other departments and officers of the Government, that injustice would not be perpetuated.

I know it may be said that abuses grew up in former times that caused the abolition of the franking privilege; but as it was then exercised it was not under the limitations and restrictions now imposed upon the sending of official matter covered by an indorsed envelope and under a penalty for a violation of the privilege.

I do not care to consume any more time in reference to this matter, but it seems to me the ends of justice would be equally subserved and common fairness would be promoted by extending to members of Congress, in their official communications, the privileges which are extended to the officers of the other Departments of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise, Mr. Chairman, to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. I can not approve of the proposition he submits, although no man has a higher appreciation of his motives than I have. I am satisfied he would not tolerate any proposition if it were within his power to prevent it which would lead to any abuse. I believe that the amendment he suggests, if adopted, will have that result, and I beg leave to differ with my friend from Texas as to the operation of the rule if we shall accept his amendment. It will be in my judgment merely opening again the doors to the abuse which in former years led to the abrogation of the franking privilege.

We are allowed now as members of Congress $125 each for our postage——

Mr. DUNN. No.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Our stationery——

Mr. DUNN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; if there is anything allowed to us for postage I have never been able to find it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I beg the gentleman's pardon, and wish to repeat that we have $125 allowed to us for our stationery and other expenses connected with it. I am satisfied that the average member of Congress will not use one-half of the $125 allowed to him for his stationery.

Mr. DUNN. But that is not an allowance for postage.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is enough left out of his allowance for stationery to pay the postage. He can take the one-half of the allowance given him for stationery, which, as I have said, is unused, and apply it to the payment of his postage.

Now if we do not get enough to cover our stationery and postage, let a bill be brought in increasing the compensation of members of Congress. Let us meet the question squarely.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in regard to this question that I regret deeply that the other branch of Congress has provided for a private clerk, to be paid at the Government's expense, for each member of the Senate. I am very sorry that ever that branch has made such a provision. I look upon it as bad legislation. I look upon it as an injustice to the tax-payers of this country; as a violation of the contract made by the Senator or Member of this House when he accepted the position with the salary and emoluments pertaining to the office, to increase them in that way when no such salary or emoluments pertained to the office at the time he accepted it; and the person who accepts an office accepts it with the conditions implied. It is not an act of justice to the people of this country to change the conditions after accepting the position. I would resist any such action in this House if it was attempted. I repeat, if the salaries of members of Congress are not sufficient to pay their postage and their other necessary expenses and such clerk-hire as they are compelled to have in order to keep up with the public business, let a bill be brought in increasing the salaries of the members of Congress who will organize the next House. We can not and ought not to do it now. That is the position I take with reference to this matter, and for that reason I shall oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

I do not care, sir, to debate this proposition any further. I rose merely for the purpose of stating my opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, there is no question upon which this Congress can legislate that comes more nearly home to the people, the whole people of the country, than the carrying of the mails. The history of the mail system is wonderful, and I want to say just here that for celerity and certainty no people on earth can excel us. Considering the immense number of letters that are daily transmitted through the mails, it is remarkable how few miscarry, and with what rapidity a letter reaches its destination.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to see the privileges which you and I enjoy extended to all the people, and I want to contribute in any way I can to that result. This Congress has passed a law declaring all public highways to be post-routes. Prior to this, whenever a post-route was desired application had to be made to Congress for it, and a bill introduced and passed establishing the route. Now that is no longer necessary. All public highways are post-routes, and the Postmaster-General may put service upon such of them as the public necessity demands and the appropriation made by Congress will allow. Now, there can be no question that it is greatly to the interest of each individual member of society to be within easy distance of a post-office, and that which is for the interest of each individual must of necessity be for the advantage of the whole. Now, in many parts of the country large numbers of highly intelligent people, people who read the papers, who write and receive letters, who seek to keep up with the general literature of the day, suffer great inconvenience for want of reasonably good mail facilities. Can we not correct that? Can we not make such appropriation and give such direction as will enable and require the Post-Office Department to extend what is called the star-route service?

We have three kinds of service—railway, steamboat, and star-route. The latter includes and means all mail service that is carried over the public roads of the country other than railroads. By the star-route service we reach the remote settlements and all places not on railroads or rivers. By this service the people in the country are supplied with the mail. Now, can we not improve this service? All public highways being post-routes now by law, the first step in the improvement of the service is to get post-offices established at a sufficient number of places in each county in every State to enable the people to get their mail without having to travel as far for it as they now do. Why, sir, take the district I have the honor to represent on this floor. Several of the counties are remote from the railroads and are only reached by the star-route service. In some of them there are persons who have to ride fifteen or twenty miles to a post-office, and that office receives a mail only once a week.

Now, if this were a new country, or if the people did not care for or want the advantages of convenient mail facilities, it would not matter so much; but such is not the case. These counties are rapidly developing; the people are thrifty and intelligent; they read the papers and periodicals of the day, and feel keenly the fact that they can not have more accessible offices and more frequent trips of the mail. Now, sir, is there any reason why in a country like that post-offices may not be established at such points as to enable each individual to get his mail by going two or three miles after it, and might not the mail go to each office three times a week at least? Of course, sir, it will cost something to do this, but in my judgment it can be done for the same amount now appropriated for the support of the Department, and that too without depriving any other section, town, or city of first-rate mail facilities. To do this, however, some change must be made in the present plan. We must stop our large expenditures in the effort to improve the service where it is already well-nigh perfect, and spend more in extending mail facilities to localities and places that are now well-nigh deprived of them.

I do not wish to be understood as being opposed to improved facilities in large cities; on the contrary I favor them, but I consider their claim for better service than they now have as subordinate to the claim of those who have hardly any service at all. Our whole mail system is self-supporting, and last year paid into the Treasury a surplus of more than $1,000,000; that is to say, the people who wrote letters and sent packages and took papers paid in a sufficient amount of money to the Post-Office Department to pay all expenses, transporting the mails, salaries, and everything else connected with it, and then left a surplus of over a million dollars. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think the Government should not make a profit from the service, and so far as I am concerned, and I think in saying this I represent the intelligence of the country. I am willing if the receipts from the Department will not support the system properly extended to appropriate money from the Treasury for that purpose.

But, sir, as I said just now, that is not necessary if we will devote the money derived from the system to its extension among the people who are now practically without mail facilities and let them in the larger cities be content for a while with the really magnificent system they now have. To illustrate this point: As the law now stands the Postmaster-General may establish free delivery of mail matter in any city having 20,000 inhabitants and upward; that is to say, in such places as he establishes free delivery the mail is taken from the office by carriers employed for that purpose by the Government and delivered to the person to whom it is addressed at his home or at his store; he does not have to go to the post-office for it; it is brought to him, and he pays no more for it than the country gentleman pays for his who is forced to ride, perhaps through the rain, ten and sometimes twenty miles to his nearest office; and more than this, these carriers do not stop at taking the mail to a gentleman's house or store once a day, they go two and three and sometimes nine times a day, and as I said just now this costs the receiver of the letter nothing; the person sending it puts 2 cents thereon and that is all. But of course, Mr. Chairman, this service and delivery costs somebody something.

Now, let us see who it is. We have in this country one hundred and fifty-four free-delivery offices; that is, offices where the mail is carried to the home of the receiver as I have just described. Now it takes 3,680 carriers to do this; it takes that many men in addition to the regular force employed to receive and distribute the mail. These men cost the Government on an average $859.95 each year, and the total cost of the free-delivery system for the last fiscal year was $3,173,336.51. So that much is paid for the luxury of having mail delivered at the door of the persons to whom it is addressed. I do not object to the luxury, but I do think the people enjoying it should pay for it. Now let us see if they do pay for it. The Department has a plan of determining that question; that is, they take the number of drop-letters at a given office and see what sum they pay, and if they pay more than the cost of the carriers at that office then they say the system is self-sustaining.

Now, taking this plan or rule as correct, and only fourteen of the one hundred and fifty-four free-delivery offices are self-sustaining; and I will say in passing that the only one of the fourteen in the entire South is Georgia's capital city—enterprising, progressive, thrifty Atlanta. There the excess of local postage over the expense of the free delivery is $256.65; but we have one hundred and forty offices where the system is not self-sustaining, and the support of carriers and other such expenses is a burden upon the general fund. Now, I do not think the Department should have improved in that direction before extending further the star-route service, but inasmuch as I think it bad policy to go backward, inasmuch as they already have the free-delivery system at these one hundred and fifty-four offices, I would not deprive them of it; but we might say that two deliveries a day were sufficient, and in that way perhaps reduce the number of carriers employed and hence lessen the expense of the system; but whether that is practicable or not, we should not extend the system to other towns or cities until we fully extend the star-route service to the people who live in the country away from towns and cities, unless it should be demonstrated that in any given city the system would be self-sustaining, would not be a charge upon the general fund. When such is the case there could be objection to its establishment.

Again, Mr. Chairman, we have in this country, or had on the 30th of June last, 2,143 post-offices of the first, second, and third class, post-offices where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000 and upward. Now, every one of these offices is located in a town or city. Compare the conveniences and privileges extended the patrons of these offices with those afforded at free-delivery offices and see the difference. In the latter, as I said before, your mail matter is brought to your door; in the former, the patron goes to the office for his mail and asks at the window for it; or if he does not wish to do that, if he is a modest man and does not wish to disturb the postmaster or his clerk by calling for his mail two or perhaps three times a day, for the mutual convenience of both himself and the postmaster he rents a post-office box. That is a place where his letters are put by the postmaster, and where he can get them without trouble to any one. For this privilege the patron pays from $2 to $6 a year. Why not improve here before extending further the free-delivery system? Why not add to the convenience of and lessen the expense to the resident of the smaller towns and cities before doing more in the direction of increasing the number of free deliveries in cities where that system obtains?

Again, why should there be such gross inequalities in the prices charged for rent of post-office boxes? Why should the rent not be uniform and cheap? Why should the person who rents a post-office box in Ohio or Illinois pay less for it than the man who rents one in Alabama or Georgia? Why should the price of box-rent in one town or city in Georgia be more or less than it is in another town or city in the same State? Can any reason be given for this distinction or discrimination between sections or places? None occurs to me; and yet such distinctions and discriminations are made. Why, sir, in the city where I live, a small but enterprising and progressive place, up to quite recently we were required to pay $6 a year for box-rent. I have myself paid that sum for years. Now we pay $4 a year. Other places in the same State pay less, and perhaps some pay more.

I am informed that in the North and East no such prices are charged. I do not think such prices should be charged anywhere. I think the price should be reduced everywhere; but if this can not be done, why should we not have uniformity? Why should not the patrons of an office where boxes are to be rented, whether the office be north, south, east, or west, whether the office be located in a large or small town or city, have the privilege of renting at the same price? Can any one give a reason for difference in prices; and why would not $1 be enough for any one to pay for box-rent? There is no expense attached to that system save only the cost of the boxes; it is really an advantage to the postmaster, and saves him much trouble. Now, you see, improvement might be had here properly, before going forward to the free-delivery cities.

But, Mr. Chairman, the great point I wish to stress is that we should do more to improve the service at the 45,720 fourth-class offices we now have, and at the same time greatly increase their number. You gentlemen who live in cities, where your mail is three or four times a day brought to your very door, or even those who can go to an office within the town where they live and unlock their box and take out their mail, have no conception of the inconvenience and trouble required on the part of a large number of our most intelligent people to get their mail; and my object is to bring that matter to your attention, so that some sort of relief may be afforded. I am not complaining at the present management of the Department. So far as I know they try to accommodate the people; I have always found the officers obliging and courteous; but I want to call a halt to the advance until the rear catches up. We understand that in matter of grace "to him that hath shall be given," &c.; but I do not want that rule applied to the postal service. I want first to give to him who "hath not," and then we can consider the propriety of giving to him who "hath" already.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask that the pending amendment be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10 of section 3 strike out the word "not."

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now Mr. Chairman I desire to say a word in opposition to the amendment. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Texas it is to give practically to members of Congress the franking privilege.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I say it is practically to give to members of Congress the franking privilege in another way. If it does not mean that, what does it mean?

Mr. HORR. Shall I tell you?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Yes; I ask the gentleman from Michigan to tell me.

Mr. HORR. If this amendment be adopted, it simply gives Congressmen the right to use free envelopes for postage on all matters where they are written to officially; the Department will have to furnish them envelopes, and then when they return the matter to the Pension Office, or any other Department of the Government, they can use one of those free envelopes. It does not give them the right to frank a general letter on general matters at all in any way, shape, or manner.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am glad the gentleman from Michigan has explained that, because it is now about as clear as mud.

Mr. HORR. That is, to you.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. It is to any man who understands about the letters that come to a member of Congress. If a letter comes to the gentleman from Michigan to-day asking him the status of a pension claim, he refers that, by the riding-page, to the Pension Office. That does not cost him a cent.

Mr. HORR. Or I go myself to the Pension Office.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. When the Pension Office replies to that letter, it not only sends the reply to the gentleman free of postage, but incloses an envelope addressed to the party who made the inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRUMM (in his seat). If the member is at home, how is it then?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I can only reply to one gentleman at a time. But if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] will rise, he can put his question in proper form.

Mr. BRUMM (having risen). Suppose I am at home and am requested while there to ascertain the condition of the pension claim of one of my constituents, then how do I get that information unless I pay the postage?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Chairman, the postage on inquiries of that sort that would reach a member while at home will not be enough to break up any member of Congress, especially when we are allowed so much for stationery. I undertake to say, sir, that the allowance now for stationery and the allowance for mileage, in addition to salary, which the members on this floor receive are quite sufficient to cover this little item, especially when you read in lines 17 and 18 of this same section the following:

Provided, That any Department or officer authorized to use the penalty envelopes may inclose them with return address to any person or persons from whom official information is desired, the same to be used only to cover such official information.

I say, sir, that as members of Congress we can not afford to open the door to the abuse which a few years ago enabled members of Congress to distribute their franks to their friends in their towns and to send their dirty clothes a thousand miles to be washed and returned under their frank. This is simply a subterfuge to get around the repeal of the franking privilege.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman think his dirty clothes would be official matter? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That might be the Wabash interpretation of it, Mr. Chairman. [Renewed laughter.] That is what I am afraid of, that the Wabash construction which would be put on the franking privilege might include the dirty clothing.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. No one will deny that the effect of this amendment is to restore practically the franking privilege in so far as concerns the sending of official matter connected with the duties of members of Congress. The gentleman from Illinois will himself, I think, admit that. And whatever may be my personal view about that question and the manner in which the repeal of the franking privilege was brought about, I want to say in my opinion the public judgment is against the re-establishment of the franking privilege. Therefore I do not think it wise for this Congress, certainly not at this time, to take any such step. I therefore hope that the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us vote instead of having the committee rise.

Mr. CANNON. I desire a few minutes.

The motion that the committee rise was not agreed to.

Mr. BELFORD. As I have said on previous occasions, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is competing with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]; they are posing before the country as the twin brothers in the interest of economy.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. BELFORD. Wait. I am only allowed five minutes.

Why should not a member of this House have a right to send free a letter on public business? Now the gentleman can answer that question. I will yield to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to answer the question why members of this House should be taxed for transmitting to their constituents answers to letters exclusively relating to public business. Any man who will object to it is so narrow between his eyes that he can look through a key-hole with both of them without obstructing the range of vision of either.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not going to attempt to cope with the gentleman from Colorado in either his wit or vulgarity.

Mr. BELFORD. Is that all the answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania can make?

Mr. RANDALL. So far as I am concerned with this franking privilege I have always had my own views; but I do say the people have condemned that practice, and that members of Congress came here knowing that they did not have the franking privilege, and I hear no demand among the people for its re-enactment.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope the gentleman will not take up all my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Colorado to yield.

Mr. BELFORD. Not for a speech. I yielded only for an answer to my question.

It is idle for gentlemen to say what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has just asserted. I say that the interest of members of this House in the transaction of their public business requires that they should be allowed to send these official letters free through the mails. This pretense of economy on your part, with $150,000,000 of surplus revenue in the Treasury [laughter], is a sham and a fraud. That is what I say.

And I will declare further that when the political campaign comes on we will expose your hypocrisy to the people of this country. We will inform them that while you have been pretending to economize in one direction you have been keeping in the Treasury hundreds of millions of dollars, and thereby keeping out of work thousands of people in this country who have been seeking employment. Take your issue, and we will join you upon it the coming summer. Hypocrisy will not win; political sham will be exposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that those who stand here for economy do so regardless of either sneers or applause, having a consciousness of performing a public duty in an intelligent, honest way. That is all that any member of Congress needs to go home with.

I do not know what may be the issues of the coming campaign. I do know one fact, and that is that the Democratic party will never be condemned for economy and frugality in public expenditures. I am quite willing to leave that issue to the people, and am certain that we will stand firmly before them, even though the gentleman from Colorado may not stand with us in that respect.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say but a word more. I do not attach any very great importance to the amendment which I have presented, nor do I think it likely that it will form a very material issue in the coming election.

When the franking privilege was abolished we abolished it entirely. We have now restored it so far as concerns all public documents sent through the mails. Most members are taxed with a great many letters about business of legislation and matters affecting their constituents. It occurred to me that inasmuch as we allowed the Departments to send communications on official business free in printed envelopes there could be no great harm in extending the same privilege to members of Congress, and no great matter of economy involved in it.

I sympathize with my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in their desire to promote economy in the administration of the Government, and I generally act with them. I did not suppose that by allowing official letters to be sent postage free by members of Congress we would thereby be making any very serious raid on the Treasury, especially when the privilege is regulated by a requirement that each such package shall be indorsed "official business," with the name of the bureau or office from which it shall go, and when there is printed on the envelope a notice of $300 penalty for using it for any other purpose in violation of the law. The amount of money which would inure to the Government by refusing to members of Congress the privilege of thus sending official communications would scarcely be perceptible in the account; yet it is something to the various members of Congress. It seemed to me to be but fair and right that they should be allowed to send official communications under cover of these penalty envelopes. I have no desire to continue the debate any further.

Mr. CANNON. I was in hopes that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] could be discussed without those references to economy or anti-economy which we have heard here bandied back and forth in a general way from one side and the other. I was in hopes that it might be considered as a business proposition. There is no reason why I as a Republican should be for or against it, or why any gentleman on the other side, because he is a Democrat, should be for or against it.

Having said that much, I want to look for a moment to the merits of the proposition. When the Forty-second Congress increased the salaries of members of Congress to $7,500 a year it repealed the franking privilege entirely, both as regards official matter and every other kind of matter sent through the mails. A subsequent Congress cut down the salaries of members of Congress to $5,000 a year, and in addition restored the franking privilege substantially.

Mr. HORR. On public documents.

Mr. CANNON. On all public documents. I want to say that the franking privilege is now as full and free, with a very slight exception, as it ever was. The exception is the letters of members of Congress and other matters not official, which they formerly were accustomed to send under their franks. I undertake to say that there is not one-thousandth part of 1 per cent. of mailable matter that is not covered by the franking privilege now which ever was covered by it prior to 1873. Tons and tons of books—two tons; yes, three tons of public documents—go now where a few years ago not one ton of documents was sent under franks of members of Congress.

What is it that does not now go under a frank which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] by his amendment proposes shall go free hereafter? Merely official correspondence in an official envelope, with a notice printed on it that there is a penalty of $300 for the use of such envelope except for official purposes.

Now, who has that kind of franking privilege? There is not a clerk of the 8,000 clerks in Washington but what has it; there is not a head of Department in Washington but what has it, and this bill extends it to the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. Let me read the bill:

The provisions of the fifth and sixth sections of the act entitled "An act establishing post-routes, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1877, for the transmission of official mail matter, be, and they are hereby, extended to all officers of the United States Government, not including members of Congress, the envelopes of such matter in all cases to bear appropriate indorsements, containing the proper designation of the office from which or officer from whom the same is transmitted, with a statement of the penalty for their misuse.

"Not including members of Congress." Every army officer and every naval officer and every other officer of the United States Government shall have the privilege of using these penalty envelopes, "not including members of Congress."

Of these thousands of people who hold office every one, big and little, has this privilege. Who are excepted? Three hundred and twenty-five members of the House and seventy-six Senators are alone by our own act, as to the identical class of matter, discriminated against as not worthy of having this privilege.

One of these officers may get a letter from John Smith about a pension or any other official inquiry, and he uses a penalty envelope for the reply; but a member of Congress can not do the same. I undertake to say that either gentlemen have not thought about this discrimination or else they have greater fear of doing right by themselves while they are doing right by about one hundred thousand other people that hold office than I have or than I think it manly for anybody to have.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] overlooks the fact, apparent from the language of this bill, that its harmony will be disturbed and destroyed if this amendment of the gentleman from Texas should be adopted. In lines 30 to 32 of this paragraph it is provided:

That this act shall not extend or apply to pension agents or other officers who receive a fixed allowance as compensation for their services, including expenses of postages.

Now, when $125 was fixed upon as the amount to be allowed members of the House and the Senate for stationery, the item of postage, which was formerly a comparatively small sum, was expressly taken into account. Gentlemen will discover this to have been the fact by a reference to the debates at the time this allowance was fixed.

My friend from Illinois will also discover another fact, that the legislation adopted in 1873, at the close of the Forty-second Congress, increasing salaries of members, was most earnestly condemned by the entire country, for the reason that members of Congress in that legislation had enlarged their compensation beyond what it was when they assumed the trust. That was the strongest ground upon which the popular condemnation rested as to that legislation. We accepted our offices upon a fixed compensation, an ample salary of $5,000 a year and mileage, going even beyond the actual cost of traveling, and $125 additional for stationery, which was intended to include this very item of postage. Can we, consistently with our own sense of duty, go back upon this contract, understood to be a contract by our constituents when they intrusted us with the duties we are now performing? We are not legislating with reference to some other portion of the people of the United States, but as to ourselves; and I submit we should in such a case be infinitely more cautious, for fear of subjecting ourselves to just criticism, than when we are legislating as to matters upon which in the nature of things we can afford to be impartial.

I trust, therefore, that this amendment will not be adopted, and that the slight expense we have heretofore borne in the payment of our own postage will be borne in the future. I trust that this House of Representatives will not in a matter of this kind, personal to ourselves, adopt such legislation as is now proposed, without any intimation from our constituents that they desire it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I again move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate on this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 99, noes 10.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills; and pending that motion I move that when the Committee of the Whole shall resume the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in one minute.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Illinois by striking out "one minute" and inserting "twenty minutes."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There has been already nearly an hour's debate on these pending questions.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it understood that the limitation proposed applies merely to the pending amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Illinois to move to limit debate upon the pending amendment and the paragraph.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. All amendments to the paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The motion can not be made in that form. The only form in which it can be made under the rules is——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me state my proposition again. It is that all debate upon the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in one minute.

The SPEAKER. The only form in which the motion can be made under the rules is to limit debate upon the pending amendment and the paragraph under consideration; but the effect of that motion if adopted would be to cut off all debate upon any amendment subsequently offered in Committee of the Whole to the paragraph.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well. I accept of course the Chair's suggestion, and in order to avoid waste of time I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Texas and move the previous question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. How is the time to be divided?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let the time be occupied by gentlemen who have not yet taken part in the discussion.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for arrangement among gentlemen on the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the gentleman in charge of the bill accepts the amendment of the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have called for the previous question and debate is not in order.

Mr. BISBEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the demand for the previous question shall be ordered, I should like to know whether it will cut of debate on an additional paragraph to the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will only stop debate on the paragraph now under consideration in the Committee of the Whole. The Chair does not know officially in the House what is being done in committee until it has been reported.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to know whether it is now in order to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois as it has been modified by the acceptance of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas?

The SPEAKER. It will be if the demand for the previous question be not sustained.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to allow ten minutes of debate on substantive propositions moved as amendments to the paragraph.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I insist on my demand for the previous question. I believe the House fully understands this question, and that it is clear enough without further debate.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not ask for further debate on that, but other on questions.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion as modified, that debate on the paragraph and pending amendment be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is an amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. The House has sustained the demand for the previous question.

The motion as modified was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion to go into committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, and by order of the House debate on the pending paragraph and amendment thereto has been limited to ten minutes.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, when I came to Congress ten years ago, in the Forty-third Congress, the franking privilege had been abolished. It had been repealed by the Forty-second Congress, and no member of the Forty-third Congress had any privilege of sending out anything from this House except by paying the postage on it. I remember I paid some $200 or $300 postage on Agricultural Reports and other public documents I sent to my constituents. I began to advocate the question for the restoration at least of the right to members of Congress to send public documents to their constituents. In conjunction with the gentleman from Indiana then representing the Indianapolis district [Mr. Coburn] I went to work to restore the franking privilege to Agricultural Reports. I succeeded. Afterward it was extended until all public documents were given the franking privilege, to be sent by members of Congress broadcast all over the country. If it had not been for that I believe the the printing of public documents would have been stopped, because no member could afford to pay the postage on them. Our salaries would not have been sufficient to distribute public documents among our people. All of the franking privilege has been, in fact, since restored except as to letters written by members of Congress.

So far as such letters are written by members of Congress on their own individual business I do not wish to disturb the settlement of that matter by the Forty-second Congress. But Congress has given to other officers of the Government the right to send in an official envelope communications on business pertaining to their offices. This right is given to all officers of the Government except to Senators and Representatives of Congress, and in a modified form it has been restored even to them. We have confided to the clerks in the Executive Department a power which we seem unwilling to intrust to ourselves. When seeking information in relation to matters of our constituents the clerks in the Departments are authorized in making their responses to slip in official envelopes to us to go through the mails free, under which to forward our answers to our constituents' letters. They do send us envelopes for that purpose, but for fear we may use them in some other way for our own private interests they always back them, to prevent our cheating the people of the United States out of 2 cents.

Now, I think I have always voted since I have been a member here that the Representatives of the people may be trusted. For one, I will take the responsibility in behalf of my own people that they will sustain me in voting to intrust in the hands of the Representatives the power which is now placed in the hands of these executive clerks.

I will cordially support any amendment which authorizes members of Congress to use penalty envelopes to disseminate intelligence to their people. Why should it not be done? This business is growing all the time with you gentlemen of the North in reference to pensions; it has been an onerous task which has been imposed upon you. It is growing in the South, because your soldiers are coming in and settling in our country, and day by day I find that business is growing on my hands in attending to the pension cases of your soldiers.

There are many other reasons why penalty envelopes should be permitted to be used for the purpose of attending to the business of the Government, and not for personal business. By granting the use of the penalty envelope to every other officer of the Government except to a member of Congress we degrade our positions and discredit ourselves before our constituents. I am opposed to it, and shall, as I have said, support any amendment that will give members of Congress the same right as to penalty envelopes that is extended to other officers of the Government.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, while I believe in the principle involved in this amendment, I shall be compelled, for reasons I shall give, to vote against it in its present shape. Some years ago, it will be remembered, Congress increased its compensation from $5,000 to $7,500 per annum, and made the increase retroactive, and in that connection abolished the franking privilege. That privilege as then existing was abused, not simply in the manner referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky, in transmitting matter not properly mailable, but not infrequently a Representative in Congress would put his frank on the back of a number of envelopes and distribute them promiscuously among his friends and constituents, who availed themselves of their use really in fraud of the postal laws of the United States.

I think it was really by reason of that violation of the law of the franking privilege that it became distasteful to the people, and there was a demand for its repeal. When Congress repealed the increase of Congressional salaries and restored them to $5,000 a year, it at the same time gave $125 for each session of Congress to each member in lieu of postage and stationery.

Now, I would be willing to stand at that if it was equal to the expenditure of the member for this purpose. I have kept some account of the amount I am expending for postage in recent years, and I think I am within bounds when I say that a member of Congress will average an expenditure of $3 a week the year round on account of postage; so that our expenditures for postage will run up to $156 or $160 a year. In addition to that we are compelled to buy every envelope, every sheet of paper, every rubber-band, every lead-pencil, every pen and penholder, every bottle of ink, and everything else that we are required to use in our correspondence. The bills—the paper upon which we write the bills that we introduce; the paper upon which we write the committee reports, upon which we send official information to the Departments or to our constituency, we pay for out of our own pockets, either out of the salary we receive or out of the appropriation of $125 now allowed us.

This amendment, as I said, is right in principle in allowing a member of Congress to transmit official information to his constituents under a penalty envelope, or a franked envelope, or whatever you may call it. It adds but little to the expenditures of the Government, for we already send tons of matter under the Congressional frank to our constituents. I think I have sent during the past week a four-horse wagon-load of books, garden seeds, and letters to my constituents under my frank.

But the reason why I shall vote against this amendment is this: I believe on principle that every member of Congress accepts his office upon an implied contract that he will serve during that term for the compensation given him by law, and that he ought not to increase it during his term; but that all increase of pay or emoluments ought to be made to take effect with the new Congress, so that the people by their votes may interpose between Congressional legislation and the Treasury, and rebuke Congress if they see proper to do so for such legislation. For such a provision I should vote. I can not support the pending amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the President of the United States in writing was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask consent to withdraw that amendment and substitute in lieu of it the words "that the privileges extended by the provisions of this section shall be allowed to members of Congress after the 4th of March, 1885."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to know if the time for debate has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course the gentleman has the right to modify his amendment in any way he sees proper.

The CHAIRMAN. To what part of the section under consideration does the gentleman offer this amendment?

Mr. REAGAN. As a proviso.

Mr WHITE, of Kentucky. I would like to ask if this conforms to the constitutional requirement——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to the floor to perfect his amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. The amendment as read from the desk is correct.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I repeat the question, whether this conforms to the constitutional requirement that no Senator or Representative shall during the time for which he was elected have the emoluments of his office increased?

Mr. MILLS. This only applies to the next Congress.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Very well.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let it be again read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Provided, That the privileges extended by the provisions of this section shall be allowed to members of Congress after the 4th of March, 1885.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 93.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to perfect the text of this bill I offer this amendment——

Mr. HORR. Has the question been taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair submitted the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and it was rejected.

Mr. HORR. But the first motion was to strike out the word "not."

The CHAIRMAN. That was withdrawn or modified by the subsequent amendment.

Mr. HORR. Then I renew that amendment to strike out the word "not."

Mr. RANDALL. Let us vote upon it; there is no debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have not yielded the floor, but rise for the purpose of offering an amendment which I am authorized to offer by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KEIFER. Let us finish this subject first.

The CHAIRMAN. This relates to the pending paragraph.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The amendment that I offer relates to it also.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send the amendment to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, line 24, after the word "Department," insert the words "or by the Public Printer;" so that it will read:

"Provided further, That any letter or packet to be registered by either of the Executive Departments, or bureaus thereof, or by the Agricultural Department, or by the Public Printer, may be registered without the payment of any registry fee; and any part-paid letter or packet addressed," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HORR. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "not," in line 10, before the word "including;" so that it will read:

The provisions of the fifth and sixth sections of the act entitled "An act establishing post-routes, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1877, for the transmission of official mail matter, be, and they are hereby, extended to all officers of the United States Government, including members of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order on the amendment. Its effect is to change existing law and it does not retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HORR. I submit that it is too late to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The amendment has just been offered by the gentleman from Michigan. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. KEIFER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 20, after the word "from," insert the words "or to," and in line 21, after the word "information," insert "and indorsements relating thereto;" so that it will read:

"Provided, That any Department or officer authorized to use the penalty envelopes may inclose them with return address to any person or persons from or to whom official information is desired, the same to be used only to cover such official information and indorsements relating thereto."

Mr. KEIFER. At present, if I may be allowed——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. KEIFER. I presume there will be no objection to a very brief explanation. At present we are daily sending out envelopes that are sent to us from the Departments. If this bill is passed as it is it may cut off that right. My object is to have the section so amended that these envelopes may be sent to us as they are now from the Pension Office, and that we may be allowed to make an indorsement on the communication so as to give an explanation to the person to whom it is sent.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Congress," in line 10, insert the following: "but including the Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and the Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster of the House."

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The question being taken on the amendment, the chairman stated that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division, and I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HORR. I make the point of order on that amendment. It is subject to the same point of order that the gentleman from Indiana made on my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no; we appropriate the money for those officers.

Mr. HORR. You change the law without decreasing expenditures.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the point of order I wish to say that you now appropriate the money out of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made too late. The committee was dividing on the question.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 83.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BISBEE. I offer what I send to the desk as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the stamped envelope, newspaper-wrapper, dead-letter envelope, and all other articles herein provided for shall be manufactured from the cheapest material obtainable in the market.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of order that the amendment does not retrench expenditures, while it does change the law. And it does seem to me to be such an amendment as should not in any case be attached to the bill. It seems to me absurd on its face.

Mr. BISBEE. It seems to be perfectly plain to me that that amendment is not obnoxious to any point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. What standard would the gentleman from Florida set up for the quality of paper?

Mr. BISBEE. Perhaps the word "suitable" should have been inserted.

Mr. RANDALL. If the Department fixes a quality of paper to be used, then the amendment is clearly right. The contract ought to go to the lowest bidder.

Mr. BISBEE. I shall modify the amendment so that it will read "cheapest suitable material."

Mr. RANDALL. To be fixed by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CANNON. I think the point of order is well taken, and I want to show why.

Mr. BISBEE. Before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] proceeds I wish to be heard a moment. I certainly did not expect the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] in charge of this bill would make the point of order on so valuable an amendment as that. I supposed it would be his highest gratification, and that of the people of his district, to see all stamped envelopes, newspaper-wrappers, dead-letter wrappers, and everything of that nature circulating through his district and State made of the cheapest possible brown paper, and addressed in blue ink, and perhaps with blue pencil. That would seem to me to be in the line of retrenchment, economy, and reform, and it is certainly germane to this bill. [Laughter.] I hope that the chairman will overrule the point of order, for I desire to make some remarks and to state my objections to this bill and the reasons why I am compelled to vote against it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Upon the point of order I want to say, if the gentleman is through, that perhaps the kind of material he speaks of would satisfy the people of his own district well. But I represent perhaps a somewhat better class of people than he does, and I know they would not be satisfied with such material. Therefore I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say a word upon the point of order, and I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment as modified by insertion of the word "valuable" before the word "material" was again read.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman from Florida if he is in earnest about his amendment?

Mr. BISBEE. I am in dead earnest.

Mr. CANNON. I support the point of order for this reason. The amendment applies to all stamped envelopes, whether they are used by the Government or whether they are used by the parties who use the stamped envelopes. Now, it does not retrench expenses upon its face. To show that it does retrench requires an argument. Gentlemen may say these envelopes may be made cheaper. The reply to that would be that if they are made cheaper they would be sold cheaper.

The truth is, the policy of the Post-Office Department has been to promote the use of stamped envelopes, for the reason that many hundred thousand dollars' worth of stamps annually are detached from letters after they have been used, washed and reused, and thereby the revenues of the Department have been lessened. Under the policy of the Department to promote the use of stamped envelopes by people generally throughout the country, the envelopes being paid for in addition to the stamp, it is right and proper that the material of which the envelopes are made shall be of such a nature that people will buy them and use them in their ordinary business; and when a stamped envelope is once used it can never be used again.

There you have an argument against the proposition of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE]. You have to resort to argument back and forth to show that the amendment he proposes will retrench expenditures or that it will not retrench expenditures, and that fact of itself proves that the proposition is subject to the point of order under the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HORR. I do not now recollect to have ever made, during my short service in this House, any remarks on a point of order. I think I once stated to the House that if there was any such question where the pathos of the speaker was tender it was a question of order. [Laughter.]

It does seem to me, however, that in this case I ought to make a remark or two. I am not certain whether I shall be able to confine myself strictly to the question of order, because my only knowledge of what it is proper to say on such a point and under such circumstances is derived from my experience here in this House, and I do not now recollect anything that has ever been before this House that has not been discussed on a point of order.

I think this amendment of the gentleman from Florida must be offered in all seriousness. If I get at his idea, it is that we should have hereafter the cheapest paper possible for all the business of the Post-Office. He gets at that notion from the character of the provisions of this bill generally. If he had only included in it that this bill itself should go to the Senate on brown paper, I rather think I should have favored it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. HORR. That is just what I was afraid of.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman is not confining himself to the point of order.

Mr. HORR. That is the very difficulty I was afraid I should meet. [Laughter.] I am going to try and tell you why I think this amendment is in order.

This is a Post-Office appropriation bill, in which you appropriate $295,000 less for the purpose of distributing your mails on the railroads than it actually needs to do the work. Such a bill as that ought to provide for cheap paper in every possible shape and form. It is a bill that cuts down below the actual necessities of the Department almost every item that has been recommended to us, and such a bill as that ought to be printed on cheap paper. [Laughter.]

I say, and I wish to say it now for fear I shall not have a chance to do so in the regular way, and I do not know but this applies strictly to the point of order—I say that since I have been in this House I have never yet voted against the passage of an appropriation bill. But you have made this bill so entirely inadequate to meet the wants of the Department for which you are legislating that I consider it my duty to vote against it here and hereafter.

And I wish to say to the House that it does not make any difference upon what kind of paper we send this bill to the other branch of Congress. I hope they will sit down to its consideration in a candid manner and try to provide in some way for the needs of this service, for this bill as it now stands will not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BISBEE. Is there any limitation of debate on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order, and rules that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill, with amendments, to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended passed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman will give us an opportunity to make an observation or two on the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demand the previous question.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman has an hour after the previous question shall have been ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not propose to occupy more than five or ten minutes of the hour, merely to explain the amendments. I will yield the same length of time to the opposite side of the House.

Mr. REED. That will do.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has an hour under the rule. But it is now 10 minutes to 4 o'clock, and the majority here mean to pass this bill to-night if we can.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] need give himself no uneasiness on that point; the majority shall have that glory if they want it. We shall not take up any time unnecessarily. The sooner the majority have the glory of this bill the better we shall be satisfied

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] calls for the previous question upon agreeing to the amendments and ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now propose to occupy five minutes; but before doing so I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE].

Mr. REED. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] would occupy about ten minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I will occupy ten minutes and allow the same time to gentlemen on the other side, so that there may be no dissatisfaction.

Mr. RANDALL. Gentlemen should understand that there will be at least two votes by yeas and nays.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE].

Mr. BISBEE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express very briefly my objections to this bill. I am very sorry that what I offered as an additional section was not adopted. This is a cheap bill all the way through—framed by a cheap party, through its cheap committee, upon a cheap estimate of the people of this country; and I think the section which I offered was in keeping with the character of the bill. The bill is not complete without it; that section was necessary to give the measure character and tone.

The majority of this House knows perfectly well that there is more population in this country this year than there was last. There are more post-offices, more clerks in post-offices, and more railway clerks needed this year than last year. Gentlemen know very well that it costs more to provide for a family of six than it does for a family of three. You know very well that you have not given money enough in this bill by at least $3,000,000. You have not given money enough to pay the postmasters of this country. You have not given money enough to pay the railway clerks now employed in this country—not enough by $26,000. The chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. MONEY] offered an amendment the other day to increase the appropriation for the payment of railway clerks by adding to the sum proposed in the bill $295,000. He told you, gentlemen, that you did not in this bill give money enough to pay the clerks now in the employ of the Government, and not one of you has even suggested that any too many are employed. He told you further that 11,000 miles of new railroads had been completed, and that it required 368 more railway clerks in order to perform satisfactorily the railway service of this country—the additional number which the Postmaster-General recommends in his report. You voted that proposition down "without rhyme or reason."

More than that; we have now through a large section of the country fast-mail service. The train leaving New York at 4.30 a. m. arrives in Florida the next day at 2.30 p. m. We are able to read in Florida at this hour to-day newspapers and other mail matter that left New York yesterday morning. But under the provisions of this bill those special mail facilities are cut off, and after the 30th of June next we must go without them. It makes a difference of one whole business day to the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, and by a slight extension, the road being now completed, of Louisiana and Texas. Yet gentlemen from a vast section of the country who are interested in this service, extending from Maine to Texas, embracing sixteen States, have practically sat silent here and permitted the other side of the House to cut off this valuable mail service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to know what this means? Have you gentlemen on the other side, who came here three months ago flushed with the victories of the past, so lost your confidence that you are driven to this mean, contemptible parsimony for the purpose of framing an issue for a Presidential election? Is that it? Or are you afraid that some of the postmasters and postmasters' clerks and railway clerks may possibly contribute a dollar or two of their salaries to aid the success of the Republican party of this country?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that gentlemen on the other side occupy an extraordinary attitude in regard to this bill. There is no appropriation bill passed by this House which is so important to the people. There is none, except this, which costs the Treasury nothing. The people of the United States day by day pay the postal bills. Nobody is taxed for this service except those who participate in its benefits. There is no taxation incident to this bill at the present time. Yet, nevertheless, gentlemen on the other side have deliberately and knowingly refused the appropriations which they know this Department needs; and they have even gone further, and refused appropriations which by law this Department must have and will have in spite of them, for until they change the law in regard to postmasters, those officers will draw their pay as surely as human instincts prompt men to keep that which belongs to them.

What, then, is the object of gentlemen on the other side? They know and understand these facts. They know and they rely upon the fact that the Senate of the United States will make these necessary appropriations. And yet they will do it for no purpose any man can understand except for the purpose of keeping their hands in. They do it for the purpose during the campaign of talking about the savings they would have made.

And yet it is an open secret here there are a good many on their side who never would have voted down the proper amendments which have been offered had it not been for assurances that the Senate would do the right thing.

Is that a proper attitude for this Chamber to occupy? Is that a proper attitude for the great party which is on trial before the public to occupy? Are they not content with tampering with the business interests of this country in every other way, but they must seek to tamper with the business interests of the country in the transmission of intelligence and of business letters?

And yet these gentlemen aspire to-day, as they have been aspiring for years, to control this country. This country may have moments of hallucination, when it permits these gentlemen to be in control of a part of the Government, being well satisfied that they are safely anchored at the other end of this Capitol.

I say to you, gentlemen, such things as these which have been more particularly described by my friend from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] are not likely to create public confidence in your methods of administering business. A million of dollars has been shown not to have been really appropriated by this bill, and yet you pretend it has been. Here are hundreds of thousands of dollars which you know must be given to furnish route-agents on the ever-increasing railroad lines of this country, which must be furnished because the business of the country demands it, and yet you refuse to make the necessary amendment. And you can not do it upon any ground that you are dissatisfied with the Postmaster-General, because he has received commendation from that side of the House to an extent which might make him almost suspicious himself. [Laughter.] Yes, the business of the country demands it and you have no excuse for not doing it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, the time allotted to me under the rules would give me an opportunity to defend this bill to the length at least of one hour. I do not claim, however, more than the same length of time I have yielded to the opposite side of the House.

The Committee on Appropriations have been sustained in all the provisions of this bill except in reference to two items; one where the amount was increased $400,000 in the letter-carrier system, and the other a reduction, under the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, of $36,000 in printing postal cards. Those are the only two amendments to the bill of the Committee of the Whole since it came from the hands of the Committee on Appropriations affecting the amount of appropriations recommended by the committee.

In answer to the observations of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] I want to say that I had the opportunity yesterday of a conversation with a leading member of the Senate, a Republican member of the Senate on the Committee on Appropriations there, who said to me that he had read this bill carefully, that he had followed the debate throughout, and that it was a fair and liberal bill.

A member rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not interrupt me; because I do not want to be interrupted.

Mr. REED. Nobody is interrupting you except yourself. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish I had the privilege of naming that Senator. I repeat, the declaration of that Senator to me, he being a Republican member of the Committee on Appropriations, was that this was a liberal bill, a fair bill. What further did he say to me? He said that he was glad to know that I had exposed the hypocrisy that was practiced by his own party in the last Congress in cutting down the appropriation for this Department far below the needs of the service.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Name the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope I will be permitted to proceed.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I ask the gentleman to give the name of the gentleman to whom he refers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to be interrupted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not want this to come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will claim an extension.

Now, Mr. Chairman, since this bill came into this House every clown on that side has been brought forward to ridicule it. Every advocate of extravagance, every defender of jobs and of railroad corporations has been brought here, and every one of them has taxed his ingenuity to the utmost extent in order to raise a false clamor against this bill.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I want to know whether the use of the word "clown" is parliamentary?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. When the clown is present it is. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. When anything disrespectful is used any member has the right to have it taken down, and the question submitted to the House.

Mr. HAMMOND. It is complimentary.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I was about to say when interrupted that in regard to the salaries of postmasters, in which the gentleman charged that we had appropriated an insufficient sum, I want to call attention simply to the fact that the last House appropriated a sum $1,250,000 (one and a quarter million) less than we have appropriated this year by this bill. That is a fact that can be ascertained instantly by comparing the bills.

But what further? The estimates of the Department last year were $185,000 less than the expenditures were for the previous year. The estimates were some $10,300,000 for one item; but to enable the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress to play their deceitful rôle they came in with an appropriation of $9,250,000 to pay the salaries of postmasters.

They were told on the floor of this House that the expenditures for the previous year were more than ten and one-half millions of dollars and that the sum they proposed was insufficient, and yet they come now parading assumed virtues and charge us with niggardly appropriations when we increase their own appropriations a million and a quarter of dollars on this item. We have increased it, I repeat, that amount over what they themselves appropriated last year, and what is the result on the bill? This bill appropriates as it now stands $2,136,000 more than they appropriated last year for this service.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I am not at all surprised at the action of that side of the House in their endeavors to throw odium upon this appropriation bill. I have been liberal in my treatment toward them with reference to this bill. They have occupied, I think it is just to say, at least one-third more time than we have occupied in the discussions on this side of the House. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and myself, having studied the bill and being familiar with its provisions, were called upon to take the floor more frequently than we wished in order to defend it from the assaults made upon it by the other side. The result was that on this side of the House comparatively few gentlemen have participated in the debates upon the bill.

But, in conclusion, I wish to say that I am not surprised at the action of the gentleman from Michigan, who simply seeks to make political capital for his party on this and other bills and who is only carrying out the programme which was laid down in the last Congress. He has adopted the same position with reference to this bill that he has taken with reference to all measures emanating from this side of the House. He seeks to make political capital out of them all.

Nor am I surprised at the action of the gentleman from Maine. I have been a member of this House with him for four years. I have served on committee with him, and venture the assertion here and now, sir, that if you examine his course of conduct on this bill and compare it with his whole course in the past you will find it to be absolutely consistent.

Mr. REED (from his seat). That is so.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If a peculator has been ever charged on this floor with maladministration; if ever an extravagant appropriation has been attempted to be made in this House, he has been found its defender. If ever the interest of a railroad corporation was at stake in this House, I have found the gentleman from Maine its champion and defender.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call the gentleman from Illinois to order, and ask that his words be taken down.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to have them taken down. I do not wish to give them so much significance. But when he talks of extravagant appropriations and of peculators, if he looks at the record in the star-route cases he will find that I voted with the committee in condemnation and that he was not here. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have never heard peculation assailed on the floor of this House but that the gentleman from Maine has sprung to his feet and defended it.

Mr. REED. Name one single instance.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I remember an instance that the gentleman from Kentucky brought up; charges that were made in the last session of Congress. I do not now remember the name of the party, but the incident all will remember.

Mr. REED. Name one.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I decline to yield.

Mr. REED. Just give us the name.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I have not time, and declined to be interrupted. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. REED. I call upon the gentleman to name one.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Just one. [Cries on the Republican side of "Give the name."]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Maine ——

Mr. REED. I want the gentleman to name one.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. When the gentleman from Maine takes his seat and behaves as he ought to behave, I will proceed with my remarks.

The SPEAKER (rapping with the gavel). The House will come to order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, that gentleman has taken occasion to assail almost every member of this side of the House, not only in this but previous Congresses, and I now propose to answer him, to let him understand that he is well known here, and that I have less regard for his estimate of myself, for his opinion of myself, than I have for the opinion of any other member upon this floor.

On last Saturday he took the floor here and imputed to me improper motives in my advocacy of this bill. I did not have an opportunity to reply to him on that occasion. But I want to say now that he is only playing the rôle that he has played ever since I first knew him in Congress, as the defender of every railroad scheme that has been brought in here, and as the obstructor of every character of legislation that has been attempted to put a restraint upon the railroad corporations and compel them to comply with their obligations and to meet their duties and their dues to the Government.

One word only in conclusion. I repeat that this bill, in all its details, is the most liberal postal appropriation bill that has ever been brought into the American Congress; and when it goes into the American Senate I vouch for it the Senate will find less fault with this bill than it found with the bill passed by the Republican House at the last session and sent to them; a bill that was born of a desire only to reduce so far the appropriations of the Government as to force this Democratic House to make large appropriations, in order that these gentlemen might turn their demagogues loose upon the stump in the next campaign and assert that a Democratic House was more extravagant than a Republican Congress.

Mr. REED. I desire to say only a word.

Fortunately the observations which the gentleman from Illinois—the Shawneetown district of that State—has had the kindness to make were made in the presence of this House, that knows both of us. Now I say to this House that my record is open to the world upon any and all topics. And there are only two sets of people for whose opinion I care a great deal. The one is my constituency, which knows me, and the other is this House, which knows him. [Applause on the Republican side.] And it is hardly necessary to say that I shall stand vindicated before them both.

I desire to say that I have never been found upon any occasion vindicating any improper measure in this House, and I have referred him to one conspicuous public occasion where a bad man was being hunted to the ground, and where I was found on the right side and he was found nobody knows where.

I desire to say another thing: that if I have at any time been found upon the side of a railroad corporation, which is a term of reproach upon his part, it has been because I was defending the cause of justice upon the floor of this House; and while I stand here a member of this House there is no man on the face of the earth so poor nor any corporation so rich that I will prostitute myself to injustice for the sake of that temporary advantage which comes of maintaining a false position because some dishonest men are clamoring against me. [Applause.]

It is the duty of every member of this House to act upon his conscience and his sense of duty. It is his business to stand up for what he believes to be right, careless of what may happen to him in consequence thereof. I do not undertake to boast here, but I venture to say that I have no occasion to lower my head in the presence of any man of this House, no matter what party he belongs to, and although I have had occasion in the course of my service here, following out my sense of duty, to say severe things about gentlemen on the other side, I venture to say that he is the only man on that side who would be capable of making the remarks he has made. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a separate vote on each. There are very few of them.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 22 strike out these words: "And no salary of any postmaster under the act entitled 'An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters,' approved March 3, 1883, shall exceed the sum of $4,000 per annum."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, the Speaker stated that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 78.

Mr. TOWNSHEND and Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 19—not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

In lines 29 and 30 strike out "$3,600,000" and insert "$4,000,000;" so that it will read:

"For payment to letter-carriers and the incidental expenses of the free-delivery system, $4,000,000."

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GIBSON, indefinitely, on account of ill-health.

To Mr. FINDLAY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the second amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the increase of $400,000 for the letter-carrier service.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 137, not voting 60; as follows:

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the vote be taken on the remainder of the amendments in gross.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the amendments had better be voted on separately.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was, to insert after line 34 of the printed bill the following:

Provided, That periodical publications other than daily newspapers when delivered within the city where they are published shall be charged with the same postage as is now imposed by law upon such publications when delivered elsewhere than in the city of publication.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was to strike out the following:

The foregoing provision, and all of the general provisions of law touching the rate of compensation of railroad companies for the transportation of the mails, shall apply to all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by subsidies in bonds and public lands granted by the United States under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and all acts and parts of acts amendatory thereof; and the said act, and the sixth section thereof, and all acts amendatory of said act, are hereby altered, amended, and modified in conformity with and to conform to the foregoing provision for the readjustment of the compensation to be paid to railroad companies for the transportation of the mails. But nothing in this provision shall be construed in any wise to affect or impair the right of Congress at any time hereafter further to alter or amend the said act approved July 1, 1862, and the act and acts amendatory thereof referred to; and the foregoing provision shall be subject to alteration or amendment as in the opinion of Congress justice or the public welfare may require; and nothing herein shall impair any right now existing in favor of the United States; and the foregoing provision touching the rates of compensation to railroads constructed under the provisions of said act of July 1, 1862, and amendment thereof, for the transportation of the mails, shall be held as in alteration and amendment of said act and of the act amendatory thereof, and of both of said acts: Provided, however, That all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads, respectively, at such price as Congress should by law direct, or on the condition that such railroad should be subject to such regulations as Congress might impose restricting the charges of Government transportation, shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to the other railroad companies for corresponding service.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, however, That all railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by the land grants made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads respectively at such prices as Congress should by law direct, or on the condition that such railroads should be subject to such regulations as Congress might impose restricting the charges of Government transportation, or whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by subsidies, in bonds and lands granted and issued by the United States under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of the railroad and telegraph line from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and all acts amendatory thereof, shall receive only 50 per cent. of the compensation authorized by this act to be paid to the other railroad companies for corresponding postal services. And the above-entitled act, approved July 1, 1862, and the sixth section thereof, and the act amendatory of said act, approved July 2, 1864, are hereby amended to conform to the foregoing provisions fixing the rate of compensation to be paid to railroad companies whose railroads were so constructed in whole or in part by subsidies, in bonds and lands, under the provisions of said act for the transportation of the mails; and said acts and each of them shall be held to be altered and amended accordingly; and the foregoing provisions, and each of them, shall be subject to amendment as in the opinion of Congress shall be just and required by the public welfare. But no right now existing in favor of the United States in relation to said railroads or either of them, or in relation to said grants or either of them, shall be deemed impaired or waived by this act or any provision thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was, to insert after the words "Agricultural Department," in line 24, page 9, the words "or by the Public Printer;" so as to read:

That any letter or packet to be registered by either of the Executive Departments or bureaus thereof, or by the Agricultural Department, or by the Public Printer, may be registered without the payment of any registry fee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call the following announcement of additional pairs was made:

Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. SMITH, for to-day.

Mr. WELLER with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, for to-day, on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. BUCKNER with Mr. DINGLEY, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. HURD with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, on passage of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. HARMER, on Post-Office appropriation bill. Mr. MORSE would vote "yea" and Mr. HARMER "nay."

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I am paired with Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, on political questions. While this seems to be a political question, there was a perfect understanding between that gentleman and myself that I should have the right to vote on the passage of this bill. With the exception of two bills I had the right to vote my own pleasure.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 4779) to change the name of the West Waterville National Bank of Oakland, in the State of Maine, to that of the Messalonskee National Bank; when the Speaker signed the same.

OHIO MUSTER-ROLLS.

Mr. CONVERSE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. Res. 210) to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, required to furnish to the governor of Ohio, upon his request, copies of such muster-rolls as are filed in his Department and other information from the records of his office as may be necessary to complete the military history of the troops that entered the service of the United States from the State of Ohio during the Mexican war and war of 1812.

Mr. CONVERSE. The object is simply to complete the military records in Ohio for publication.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask that the State of Kentucky be included as well as Ohio.

Mr. CONVERSE. I have no objection. I can state that the Legislature of Ohio has made an appropriation and required the governor to complete this list and have it published for the benefit of the State. This is to supply omissions in the rolls of certain regiments from the War Department files. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I should like to have my amendment inserted.

Mr. COSGROVE. I also want Missouri included.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object to the resolution if my amendment is not allowed to come in.

Mr. CONVERSE. It comes too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman to object when it was asked for; and it now comes too late.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to include Kentucky.

Mr. CONVERSE. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was disagreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 20, noes 71.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONVERSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORESTRY.

On motion of Mr. SKINNER, of New York, by unanimous consent, the following petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

To Congress:

At a regular meeting of Jefferson County Pomona Grange, held in the city of Watertown, N. Y., March 5, 1884, the following resolution was introduced by D. S. Marvin, of Watertown, and unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That Congress be requested to enact laws for the restoration, maintenance, and government of the forests and unoccupied lands of the public domain; also, that the necessary laws be enacted for establishing schools of forestry in connection with the West Point schools, the Agricultural Bureau at Washington, and upon unoccupied lands of the public domain, so that the students may be employed as forest guards and in acquiring and disseminating a knowledge of forestry among the people."

GEO. E. HERRICK, Master,
Three Mile Bay, N. Y.
S. C. WIGGINS, Secretary,

And then, on motion of Mr. WARD (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 19, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PENSION LEGISLATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate yesterday ordered the printing for the use of the Senate of the remarks of the delegation of the Grand Army of the Republic before the Committee on Pensions. The order provided for printing the document "for the use of the Senate," and it was accordingly journalized as proposed to be printed for the use of the Senate. A difficulty arises at the Printing Office in respect to how many copies shall be printed. If there be no objection the usual number for the use of the Senate, under the ordinary practice being two hundred and fifty copies, will be printed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be entered.

DISCOVERY OF PHOSPHATES IN BRAZIL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying letter and papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 15th of January last, respecting the discovery of phosphates upon the coast of Brazil by a citizen of the United States, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State upon the subject, together with the accompanying papers.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, March 18, 1884.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a communication of the Secretaries of War and the Navy concerning the expediency of offering rewards for the rescue of Lieutenant Greely and party by the independent efforts of private vessels, in addition to sending the three ships constituting the national relief expedition.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 18, 1884.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate, and calls the attention of Senators to it, a petition of the Delaware Indians, asking that their status and rights as citizens of the Cherokee Nation may be defined and protected. The rule of the Senate prohibits the introduction of any petition from the subjects of any foreign nation or power; and whether the Chair can properly lay this petition of the Delaware Indians, they not being citizens of the United States in the technical sense, before the Senate, the Chair leaves to the consideration of the body. If there be no objection the Chair will lay the petition before the Senate, and it will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so referred.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of late officers of the volunteer army, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1306 and House bill No. 3485, proposing to fix the rate of pension hereafter to be granted to all commissioned officers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of inventors, merchants, and other citizens of the United States, praying for the recommittal to the Committee on Patents of certain bills proposing to amend the patent laws, in order that they may have a hearing in regard thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of Mrs. N. Cushman, widow of the late Commander C. H. Cushman, United States Navy, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LAPHAM presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the New York State Cane-Growers' Association, held at Geneva, in that State, in favor of the continuation of the appropriation of a suitable sum of money for the purpose of experimenting in the different processes of sugar-making; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LAPHAM. I hold in my hand a resolution of the Free Canal Union of the State of New York, adopted at a meeting held at the rooms of the Chamber of Commerce on the 14th of the present month, in which they ask a favorable consideration of House bill No. 3538, which provides for the payment of $1,000,000 annually for the period of ten years for the purpose of making permanent improvements upon the Erie Canal.

When De Witt Clinton and his associates projected the construction of that great water way they sought the aid of the General Government at that early period, but in the then condition of the country and of the finances of the Government they were unable to procure the aid, and the canal was constructed by their energy and skill without any such aid. The reasons which applied at that time for such assistance from the General Government have increased a hundred-fold; we are in a condition now to grant the aid, and I think the condition of that work is such that it should be given.

The canal has been twice enlarged and the locks doubled since its original construction. Two years since the people of the State of New York by a very large vote declared that it should be forever free to the people of the United States as a channel of commerce. It is now being supported by an expenditure of nearly three and a half million dollars by way of taxation from the people of the State. The canal needs further enlargement of the locks and further deepening of the channel in some of its portions to make it a most effective water way. The object of this legislation and of this aid from the Government is to make the canal what it should be in its present condition as a free water way, the most effective water way possible for the use of the public.

I trust that this subject will receive the earnest consideration of the Senate in the support of the bill which is referred to in the resolution. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 1441) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River and to prescribe the dimensions of the same, setting forth the ground on which they believe that the construction of the bridges proposed will interfere with the commerce of the Kanawha and Ohio Rivers, and suggesting certain modifications and changes in the bill. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have a memorial and resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati in relation to Senate bill 1441, remonstrating against the passage of that bill, which provides for the construction of bridges over the Great Kanawha River. I presume it is the same memorial and resolution just presented by my colleague, but I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of T. M. English, administrator of the estate of Richard Fitzpatrick, deceased, praying compensation for wood and rent of property used by the military authorities of the United States, as ascertained by a judgment of the Court of Claims, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate of December 5 last to inquire into the expediency of creating a military academy west of the Mississippi River for the training of Indian youths as soldiers, &c., to submit a report expressing the opinion of the committee against the proposed legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and the report will be placed on file.

Mr. SAWYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of New Jersey and New York praying for the passage of a bill authorizing the construction of bridges across Staten Island Sound, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, as the bill is before that committee.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Committee on Foreign Relations, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate of January 22, 1884, to inquire into and report to the Senate such legislation as shall protect our interests against those governments which have prohibited or restrained the importation of meats from the United States, have directed me to report a bill which they deem necessary and proper legislation upon the subject.

The bill (S. 1876) providing for an inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. VANCE. I ask leave at some future day to file the views of the minority on the bill just reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That leave will be granted, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1538) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of James Beatty, late of Baltimore, Md., submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 1877) granting an increase of pension to John Hall; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1878) for the relief of Zunis Swick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1879) for the relief of H. B. Oatman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1880) for the relief of Francis M. Vanderpool; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1881) for the relief of W. H. Tibbits; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1882) authorizing the employment of secretaries by the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1883) for the relief of George Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1884) for the relief of Daniel A. Dwight and the legal representatives of Henry W. Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAYARD introduced a bill (S. 1885) for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, Del.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 1755) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, be reprinted, as the copies heretofore printed are exhausted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be entered. The Chair hears none.

MEAT EXPORTATIONS.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted the following concurent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 6,000 extra copies of the report and accompanying documents of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate upon the resolution of the Senate requiring said committee "to inquire into and report such legislation as shall protect our interests against those governments which have prohibited or restrained the importation of meats from the United States;" 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

NAVAL FORCE BY STATES.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish to the Senate, so far as the records of his Department will enable him, the number of men contributed to the Navy by each State during the late war.

AMENDMENTS OF THE RULES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolution," that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar, under Rule VIII.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senate to consider at this time the resolutions that I reported a couple of days since from the Committee on Rules, taking up first the amendment proposed to Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 379, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the eighth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to now consider the resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to state that the only object of this amendment is to prevent the waste of time that all of us have so often witnessed in debating the question as to which of two or more measures shall have consideration. It simply provides that that question shall be settled without debate. That is all that I desire to say in explanation of the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. The Committee on Rules reported several amendments to the rules. One of them was passed without any attention being attracted to it in the Senate; the others were postponed.

I have no objection whatever to the amendment of the rule now proposed, but the one which authorizes the President of the Senate to lay before the Senate at any time bills from the House and messages from the President of the United States was proposed when the committee reported a general change in the rules, and if I recollect aright on consideration by the Senate rejected. It will have the effect which we at some time shall feel to be a great inconvenience, of adding to the number of cases already too large in which it is in the power of a single Senator to compel the Senate, whether a majority desire or not, to displace the business which is pending and which the Senate desires to complete. It seems to me that that rule would operate very hard unless it shall be construed by the Chair, as I hope it will, to allow any Senator when the Chair lays a bill or series of bills from the House before the Senate, before making the question of reference in order and debatable, to raise the question of consideration, as may be done when other privileged motions or even privileged reports are made. With that interpretation of the rule it will do no harm; without that it will at some time be a very serious and dangerous weapon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state to the Senator from Massachusetts, if he may be permitted to do so, that although the question is not now before the Senate, the Chair would hardly under the practice of the Senate feel authorized to entertain a motion which would raise the question of consideration. It is a matter, so far as the Chair understands, that has never been brought forward in the Senate. Of course any Senator may object to the second reading of a bill from the House of Representatives, which would instantly put it over until the next day; but the Chair, speaking now informally to the Senator from Massachusetts, is inclined to think——

Mr. HOAR. Would the Chair hold that the question of reference would not be open, by laying the bill before the Senate, as of right?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not the question of reference. After the first reading the next question would be the question of second reading. That being objected to could not take place on that day, but would carry the bill over until the morning of the next day.

Mr. HOAR. That would completely relieve the rule from the difficulty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill would then be open to debate on the question of its second reading.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose, however, that it is the settled parliamentary rule, even as applied to reports of conference committees, that the question of consideration may be raised, and, if so, it is to be determined without debate by vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule expressly provides that that question as to a conference report shall be determined without debate. The question is on agreeing to the resolution now before the Senate amending Rule VIII.

Mr. BAYARD. If it is to be understood by this amendment that the opportunity for a succinct, intelligible explanation of a measure proposed for the consideration of the Senate is to be excluded, I think the amendment had better be modified in order that some reasonable and intelligible explanation may be made possible.

By the rules of the Senate a petition is to be stated in substance. The purport of the address to the consideration of the Senate must be stated by the Senator offering it under the rule, and we know that in consequence the object of petitions is explained, and where it can be more shortly done, and the Senate does not object, the petition itself may be read in full in order for self-explanation.

It seems to me that the effect of the rigid construction of the amendment now offered would be to cause the Senate to vote oftentimes blindly, without knowledge of the meaning, of the intent, of the object to be reached.

Debate signifies, as I understand, a discussion pro and con, and relates to the merits of the subject; but surely when a motion to postpone a present order and substitute another is made there ought to be an opportunity to explain the nature of the other without debate, that is to say, without entrance upon the merits pro and con of the subject.

I submit that the common sense which ought to mark all our action here would suggest that the rule now proposed should be subjected to the qualification and perhaps the modification that would permit a statement explanatory in a succinct way of the subject which it is proposed the Senate should prefer in the order of consideration. Offering such explanation is not of course debate. The Senator presenting a petition is required to state its purport in order that the Senate may know whether it is a subject proper to be received or whether it is an abuse of the privilege of petition. So it seems to me that when the question of the precedence of measures is to be considered, a statement of the subject-matter, an explanation of the object and intent of the bill sought to be brought before the Senate, ought to be allowed for the purpose of enabling the Senate to act intelligently.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I take for granted, if the rule as reported by the committee shall be adopted, that any Senator in the very making of his motion to proceed to consideration would submit a statement of the general character of the proposition and the reason why, in his opinion, it was important for present consideration. That would be done in the making of the motion itself. Beyond that the Committee on Rules were unanimously of opinion that it was unwise to allow a debate as to the consideration of this or that or one of a dozen different bills that may be brought into the discussion and as to the relative importance of each, in view of the fact that all of us have witnessed hours spent here in a discussion as to which measure shall be considered, to the destruction of the time necessary to the consideration of either. I think my friend from Delaware will find no inconvenience in the operations of this rule if it shall be adopted, when without it we are liable to waste the two hours between this and 2 o'clock to-day in discussing the question as to what measure shall be considered. I hope the rule will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire now the consideration of the proposed amendment reported by myself the day before yesterday to Rule X.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 392, being a resolution to amend the tenth rule. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the tenth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"And all motions to change such order shall be decided without debate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to offer the following amendment: after the word "order," in the first line, I move to insert:

Or to proceed to the consideration of other business.

So as to make the proposed amendment of the rules read:

And all motions to change such order, or to proceed to the consideration of other business, shall be decided without debate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

JAMES H. WOODARD.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Order of Business 359. It is a private bill, but it is a meritorious one, and as I do not often trouble the Senate with such requests I hope this may be allowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate now proceed, as he has a right to make that motion, to the consideration of Order of Business 359, being the bill (S. 1027) for the relief of James H. Woodard.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 6, after the word "infantry," to strike out "all," and in line 9, after "1864," to strike out:

"The said payment to be made out of any unexpended balance of the Army appropriation for 1864, and if there be none, then."

So as to make the bill read:

That the Paymaster-General of the Army is hereby ordered to pay to James H. Woodard, late adjutant of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry, the pay and allowances of an adjutant of infantry from the 7th day of March, 1864, to the 22d day of June, 1864. Payment shall be made out of the appropriation for the Army for the present year.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALARIES OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up Order of Business 373, being the bill (S. 1852) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum, and notwithstanding the rule just adopted I ask unanimous consent to make one statement to the Senate.

This bill was reached in its order on the Calendar during my absence in the service of the Senate and by its direction some three or four weeks ago, and was recommitted, or rather the bill for which this is a substitute and successor was recommitted, in order to obtain some further information in regard to some of the districts in the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that the bill applies to all the district judges in the United States. I have no doubt that many of the district judges earn $5,000, and perhaps more; but it must be known that in many of the districts the judges do not earn anything like such a salary, as compared with the services rendered by other judges. Take the Delaware district; I know something about that. The judge of that district does not perform any more service than the judges of the State courts and not as much; and yet the chief-justice of my State does not get more than half the allowance named in the bill for the United States district judge. I do not say that the chief-justice of my State gets enough; I do not think he does for the services rendered. I think the salary now fixed for the district judge for Delaware, $3,500, and for many other districts, is sufficient. There are many other district judges that do not render service beyond the pay they are now getting, and yet here is a proposition to increase the salaries of all those judges.

I am perfectly willing to vote for an increase in any district where it is needed, but I am not willing to vote for an increase in all the districts, without regard to the services which the judges render. I shall therefore not give my vote for the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this bill was recommended by the committee on the most careful and thorough inquiry from judges and Senators and other sources of information in regard to the labors and duties of the different judges; and it appears that in nearly all the districts in the United States the judges are fully employed in a hard year's work every year. There are some thirteen or fourteen in which the judges are not employed the whole time; but it seemed to the committee that the number was so small that it was not worth while to go into an inquiry as to whether any particular judge did or did not earn as much as any other. The business is constantly and most rapidly increasing. The judges of the district courts are judges of the circuit courts ex officio, entitled to hold those courts; and even in the smallest district great questions concerning railroads, great questions concerning manufactures, and in case of war great questions of prize, are liable to be presented to the judge; and you want in every district in the United States, even if in a few the judge is not employed the whole time, a man of legal learning, of legal ability, of independence, of integrity, and of a weight that shall give authority and public respect to his decisions. In those respects the judges of all the districts ought to have the same qualifications. A man to whom the people of the United States can commit the duty of arresting a great railroad, with a capital of millions or hundreds of millions of dollars, of dealing with the questions which concern such a road on the one side and the public on the other, is required in every district of the United States. Such a man as that, whether he is employed the whole year or not, is bound to hold himself the whole year at the command of the United States. He must be ready to be summoned to hold court in any other district in his circuit at the discretion of the circuit judge. He must abstain from professional labor; he must abstain from ordinary business. It would not be considered compatible with the decencies and proprieties of life to have the district judge of Delaware or of Southern Florida engage in mercantile business or in the service of a great railroad or still less in professional business.

Under these circumstances it seemed to the committee that the proper rule was to put all the judges on an equality. The judge of the district court of California now has $5,000 a year. There are a few States where the judges of the supreme court, the principal court of the State, have a smaller salary, yet as a rule the States are increasing the salaries of their judges. In the State of New York it is double the amount, I believe, which the district judge is given by this bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Do the salaries of the circuit judges remain as they are?

Mr. HOAR. The salaries of the circuit judges are $6,000. This bill does not deal with that question at all.

Mr. HALE. What is the lowest salary?

Mr. HOAR. Now $3,500. This bill makes all $5,000.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not intend to say anything about the value of the services of judges in any district or State of the Union outside of that in which I live.

The State of Texas is divided into three judicial districts. Each of those districts has an average of about 97,000 square miles. There are three different points in each district where the court is holden. I know, and I speak with confidence in respect of my own district when I say, that there is probably not a district judge in the United States who has the confidence of the people of the United States more than Judge McCormick has of the people, irrespective of party, in the northern district of Texas. He is a man of ability, he is a man of courage, he is a ripe scholar and an able lawyer, and a fairly impartial judge. I never heard him accused of permitting politics to interfere with his opinions.

With respect to the western district I am not so well acquainted with the work of Judge Turner. In the eastern district the judge has died recently, and there is a vacancy there now which ought to be filled by a competent man. If these judges do their duty, if they are competent for the great task which is assigned to them by the law in those three districts, they are certainly entitled to $5,000 salary. I know that Judge McCormick is entitled to it in the northern district because I know that he does his duty fully and well, and if the others do their duty equally as well they are equitably entitled to that pay. I have so much respect for the judiciary and for the securing of men who will justly deal with life, liberty, and property, that I want to secure the very best men that can be had, and I know in my State a man who is capable of making a competent Federal judge can not be secured for a small salary. I want the best; I shall therefore vote for the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the salaries of the district judges in different parts of the United States are now graduated by acts of Congress so as to pay them for supposed extraordinary services in certain districts. That is a very much wiser provision than it is to fix the salaries of all the judges upon the same basis. The judges in the Territorial courts have as much to do in the service of the United States as the judges of the district courts of the United States, and if we raise the salaries of one set we ought to raise the salaries in all of them.

The judges who are now upon the bench have sought appointments to these places. I expect that remark can be made almost without exception throughout the entire country. Not only have they sought the places, but they and their friends have been seeking them assiduously, and through political and other influence earnestly, knowing what the salaries were, expressing in that way in the most formal manner their desire to hold these offices on the salaries that Congress had then provided. There had been no intimation of an intention on the part of Congress to do otherwise than to have larger salaries in certain exceptional cases, and the judges when they accepted these offices understood that that was the attitude of public sentiment amongst the legislators of the country and amongst the people.

If there is any judge on the bench of the United States who would prefer to take the risk of resigning and being reappointed in order to get a higher salary, I should be willing to accommodate him; and I shall offer as an amendment to this bill:

Provided, That this act shall apply only to judges that shall be hereafter appointed.

There are some judges in the United States that I could name whom I would very willingly present this contingency to. I would be very willing indeed to see whether they would let loose the hold they have on office now with a view of getting a more just compensation, one that they thought was better suited to their talents and abilities, and one that perhaps the Executive and the Senate might consider that they were better entitled to.

There is a principle in the general law of the United States that a man who accepts an office takes it with the understanding, particularly if it is a life tenure, that the emoluments of that office ought not to be increased during the term of his office, unless it may be for very exceptional reasons. That principle ought to be applied to this bill. I should be willing to say that a judge of the district court of the United States should have $5,000 if by saying that we could induce to go upon the district bench a higher order of talent and ability than we now have. But this bench has been filled up at $3,500 prices, and I suppose we have been fortunate in getting $3,500 men, and I am not for holding on to $3,500 men and raising the price to $5,000. That is not fair to all the judges; it is not fair to the people, and it is not a just method of legislation either.

I could name some of the judges who have not very much to do who have salaries now that are larger than the governors of the States in which they reside, larger than the States can afford to pay to their most exalted officers, the chief-justices of their own courts, &c. I think when we send our judges into the poorer States, the smaller States, where there is not so much business to do, it is not exactly becoming in us that we should send them in on very large salaries with a view of having contrasts presented before the world of the ability of the Government of the United States to reward its servants with the ability of the States to reward theirs. The people of the United States in the different localities of this country estimate their own ability to pay taxes, and correspondingly they fix the salaries of the judges of their courts. In my State we are not able to pay the judges of the supreme court such salaries as are provided by this act; and yet I should do the Supreme Court of the Unites States not the slightest injustice if I were to say that the three gentlemen who now preside in the supreme court of Alabama would ornament that bench. Neither are we able to pay our governor a salary at all equal to that which is proposed by this bill.

Our Federal judges in some parts of the South devote a large portion of their time to the consideration of those judicial questions which are involved in public elections. They are very important judicial questions, we all know, and they devote themselves in a large portion of their administrative labors to taking care of the Congressional and other elections in which the United States is concerned. They have been willing to do that, I suppose, for the sake of the political renown they could bring around themselves at salaries of $3,500 a year; and I am not willing to increase their pay merely for the distinction they have gained in those branches of judicial science at the expense of all reputation in other branches, where they are known to be and confessed to be ignorant of their duties and of the rights of the people under the law.

I do not feel that I should be satisfying the sentiment in my State at all if I were to increase the salary of the district judge who resides there, and who sits at three places and has but 50,000 square miles of country over which his jurisdiction extends, and certainly I should not be able to find any justification in the fact that Texas happens to have a very fine judge who presides in a district the area of which is 97,000 square miles, as I believe the Senator from Texas informs us. He does not quote that as a precedent for Alabama. I am very glad he does not. I can not accept it in any sense as being an argument applicable to my own State.

I should be willing, I believe, to vote for this bill, notwithstanding I do not concede that it is a just bill in every sense, if the proviso that I offer to it is put upon it by the vote of the Senate, for I would like very much indeed to ascertain whether some of the district judges of the United States are really willing to resign their offices and take the chances of reappointment in order to raise their salaries $1,500 a year. If they are willing to take that risk I am, and I should like to lay that much inducement before them and see whether or not they could be tempted into that act of public grace, as I consider it, of tendering a resignation to the President in order that they might have the opportunity, if he saw fit, for reappointment, and that the Senate might have an opportunity to judge somewhat of their fitness for the place upon the question of confirmation. But unless the bill is so amended I shall vote against it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I hope this bill will pass and without amendment. So far as my knowledge and observation extend I think that the judges of the district court are men whose ability and experience fairly entitle them to this salary, and in many instances to a much higher salary. It may be possible that in some districts in the country such is not the case; but if that be true it is a matter which will regulate itself in the years which are to come, and I think that as deaths occur and resignations take place and the offices become vacant, the result of passing this bill will be that men of perhaps a higher order of ability, of more experience, of better qualifications for the office will be appointed.

I do not believe that with any party in power the selection of district judges is to be controlled to any extent by political considerations. I believe that any President of any party will so far regard the wishes of the people, the high character of the offices, that more and more those appointments will be relieved from any imputations of being made for political considerations. I desire that the judiciary of this country shall be a judiciary which will reflect credit upon our system of jurisprudence. I desire that this department of our Government shall not only be kept up to the high standard of excellency which has characterized it in the past, but shall constantly be increased in its efficiency and in the estimation in which it is held by this people; and I do not believe that these results can be obtained when we pay so inadequate salaries as are paid in most of the districts in this country. I do not believe it is wise to make any discrimination in the salaries which are paid to these judges, and I do not believe it is wise to adopt the amendment which is suggested by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I stated when I was on the floor before that I had no objection to an increase of the salary of the district judge in any district where the service required is not compensated by the present salary paid. My objection is to raising all the salaries without reference to the services performed by the judges.

I differ with the Senator from Connecticut when he says that political considerations do not enter into the appointment of judges. I have been here for some thirteen years, and I do not remember that a single district judge or supreme court judge has been nominated of the party to which I belong in all that time. There may have been an instance, but I do not remember one. I think it is unfortunate that political opinions do enter into the appointment of judges; and the very fact that they have entered in and colored the appointment of judges to the district court and the circuit court and the Supreme Court of the United States has lessened the respect of the people of this country for the judgments of those courts.

Why, sir, take the recent opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States on the legal-tender question; if that should be affirmed and reaffirmed by the present court, constituted as it is of members of one political party almost exclusively, it would fail to command the respect of a very large portion of the people of this country. It is unfortunate that political considerations do enter in; but we all know, judging from the past, that they will continue to enter into the appointment of judges.

But it is not because of the political complexion of the courts that I interpose an objection to this indiscriminate raising of salaries. It is because I honestly believe that a portion of the district judges will be compensated far in advance of what they ought to receive as compared with other district judges of the same grade. Then suppose you give the district judges in some of the districts $5,000, how does that compare with the services rendered by the judges of the Supreme Court at salaries of $10,000? Those judges come here and spend a large part of the year in laborious service, whereas the district judges remain at home and hold their court in the town where they live—it is so in the district where I reside—subject to comparatively no expense beyond the ordinary expenses of their families. The judges of the Supreme Court are compelled to come here and live in this city on a salary of $10,000, which is perhaps not more than sufficient to pay their expenses here, whereas the district judges upon a salary of $5,000, doing but very little service, are not put to any unnecessary expense by reason of their appointment. If they were pursuing any other avocation, or if they pursued no avocation in life, they would have the same expenses for their families that they incur at present.

I am opposed therefore to that feature of the bill which proposes to make no discrimination between the judges of the districts courts, but to pay them all alike, to pay those men who render comparatively very little service the same salary that you pay those men who are occupied almost ten months out of the year. It is not fair, it is not just, and I do not believe it is in accordance with the general sentiment of the people of this country. They pay the taxes out of which these judges are paid their salaries, and instead of increasing the burden and expense of the Government, our true policy ought to be to economize as far as possible. But unfortunately at the present time we have a Treasury overflowing, and while that is the case extravagance will be the rule. If we would cut down the taxes of the people, lighten the burdens of the people, reduce the taxation that is laid upon the people, and have in the Treasury only sufficient to meet the wants of the Government, then we should have economy instead of extravagance as a rule; but I fear that while this excessive taxation is kept up, while the doctrine of protection for the sake of protection is kept up, pouring untold wealth into the Treasury, extravagance will be the rule, and we shall not only increase the salary of judges, but we shall increase the salary of everybody else, and give the hard earnings of the people collected by taxation in extravagant appropriations from the public Treasury. I am opposed to it, and so far as I am concerned my record shall be against it. I shall vote for the strictest economy consistent with the interests of the country, against extravagant salaries and extravagant appropriations, if I know it.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator from Delaware takes his seat I should be glad to obtain his view upon one point. He was liberal enough to say that he would be willing to raise the salary of those district judges where the compensation now given was inadequate to the services performed. I should be glad if he would advise the Senate what, in his opinion, is the measure of compensation for a district judge of the United States who is compelled to give all his time to the United States, debarred from engagement in other avocations, and prevented from engaging in the practice of his profession. What is the measure of compensation?

Mr. SAULSBURY. If I were to judge I should have to judge by other matters. I should have to make a comparison of the services of that judge with the services of other people. I ask the Senator what he thinks is a fair compensation for Senators of the United States, who have to incur the expense of an election to this body, who have to incur the expense of bringing their families from their homes and keeping them in Washington city? What would he consider a fair compensation for members of the Senate?

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator pause a moment there?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let me answer the question. I am perfectly willing to take the pay that is given to Senators as a measure for district judges who are occupied all their time in the service of their country, and I do not see that there is any reason why we should go beyond that for district judges while we retain our own salaries at the sum of $5,000.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator has referred to the compensation received by members of this body. This year we assembled on the 3d of December, and may be here until the 1st of August. Last year we assembled in December, and adjourned on the 4th of March. Would the Senator make any discrimination between the compensation that we are to receive based upon the number of days we are engaged in the public service?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator that though we may not be here for six months every year, we are still Senators of the United States fitting ourselves as best we can for the business before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Apply that to judges. Although they may not be employed six or nine months in every year, they are still engaged in fitting themselves for the discharge of their duties. They are compelled to sit whenever they are called upon. How can you measure the compensation of a person who is appointed to a place of that kind by the days that he is actually employed?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I take it, Mr. President, that the Senator from Kansas in assuming the position which he occupies has abandoned all other business; is engaged in no other business?

Mr. INGALLS. There are plenty of Senators here who try cases in the Supreme Court; there are many of them who are occupied in various mercantile enterprises. Does the Senator from Delaware seriously propose to state that as a matter of fact all the earnings of members of this body are confined to the compensation they receive as Senators?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, I do not; but I will venture the assertion that the Senator from Kansas himself scarcely ever goes into a State court; I will venture the assertion that his business as a lawyer has fallen off so that it is not now worth pursuing; and that is the case with most of the members of the Senate who are lawyers. Some of them may have other business in which they are engaged. I know that so far as I am concerned I had an excellent and lucrative practice when I came into the Senate of the United States. I turned the key in my door. I have tried a few cases since then which have lingered on the record, but at present I have no connection with any case, I believe, on the calendar of my court. So it is, I know, with most of the Senators here who are lawyers. Some few who have attained to that distinction in the profession which commands the attention of the country are employed to argue cases in the Supreme Court upon briefs furnished by other lawyers. Unfortunately some of us have not attained that position at the bar which secures to us large fees and large compensation for arguing in the Supreme Court cases upon the briefs made up by other lawyers; and most of us, therefore, are in the position that I said we are.

Mr. INGALLS. The position the Senator occupies in response to my question is that a proper measure of compensation for district judges would be that which is paid to Senators of the United States. That is exactly what this bill provides. So I understand the Senator abandons the position he occupied, and states now that he believes the just measure of compensation is that which is paid to Senators.

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir; I said where they were engaged for any large portion of the year.

Mr. INGALLS. How large a portion?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will not specify six months or one month or two months; but the Senator knows full well that the measure which he now advocates is not just to give the same salary to all the district judges when one of them is occupied ten months in the year and another is not occupied altogether two months in the year. There can be no justice in that. I am not unjust. Where men spend all their time in the service of the country or a large proportion of their time, I am not so unjust as to say they should not be properly compensated; but I do say that it is unjust to take the money of the people and with it to give to gentlemen who are occupied perhaps not more than two months in the year the same salary you give to a judge who is occupied ten months.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator's position, then, is that if the judge is occupied all his time he is worth more than $5,000 a year.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator can state my position as he pleases; I have not stated it as he chooses to state it. I have stated fairly and frankly that there are some of the district judges who I have no doubt are fully entitled to the compensation proposed, and that there are others of the district judges who are not entitled to it if you compare their services with those of others who perform more onerous duty.

Mr. INGALLS. What does the Senator think about the district judge in his own State?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say the district judge in my own State does not earn a salary of $5,000 as compared with the other districts where the judges are occupied for ten months.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that a fair compensation for the judge in that State?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think he is fairly compensated now at a salary of $3,500. I know that there are a number of members of that bar who would be glad to have the position at that salary, and I do not propose to give a bounty to other gentlemen to come in and ask for the place. I do not know a single Republican lawyer in all the State but what would perhaps be willing to take the position. I know there are some competent lawyers in the State who would be glad to have the position at the present salary. What is the necessity, therefore, of increasing it? We can get almost any number of applicants for the office at the present salary without increasing it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think, sir, that there is nothing that the people of this country look upon with more disfavor than the tendency toward high offices and increase of salaries. It is a wide mistake to suppose that by increasing salaries you get better officers, that the quality of the officer is improved with the price we pay. I am against the bill, and I am not for the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Sir, the simple question is, Can we get competent judges at the salaries we now pay? I think we can. Do any of them propose to resign because of the inadequacy of the pay? Let them resign, and I am sure we can find better men.

Mr. HOAR. Let me ask the Senator whether he supposes that if Congress should reduce our salaries to $4,000 a year Senators would resign?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No.

Mr. HOAR. Not one?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not one of them.

Mr. HOAR. Then why does the Senator not labor to have our salaries reduced to $4,000?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not required to answer that question in order to illustrate the argument I am making.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rose only to say a very few words.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I wish to say only a word in reply to the suggestion just made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I suggest that the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts would apply provided the Senator from Kentucky was proposing to raise his salary beyond $5,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Exactly; and that was the reason I would not answer him on that point.

I assert that in all my observation I have never known a case where the quality of an office-holder was improved by an increase of his salary. These judges rarely die and never resign, and when in the providence of God one of them is taken off the bench we find forty applicants here worrying the President for the place, and we find efforts made every session of Congress to divide the States so as to make more districts. There is an application in my own State now for another district.

I can remember when the salary of the highest judges in my State was $1,500 for the judges of the supreme court and when the circuit judges of the State got only $1,000, and the quality of our judges then was superior to what it is now. Then we had such men as Bibb and Gill and Ouseley on the circuit bench at $1,000 a year and on the supreme bench of the State at $1,500. I do not think it will improve the quality of the district judges of the United States to increase their salaries. It will be adding to the expenses of the Government and the taxation of the people without securing any better service. I think the best thing to do, if they have too much labor, is to restrict them within their proper jurisdiction that they once had, and turn over to the State courts the extra business that seems to be thrown into the vortex of Federal jurisdiction. Instead of increasing the number of Federal courts and the salaries of the judges, I think we had better limit their jurisdiction.

I did not rise to make a speech, but merely to enter my protest against the practice session after session of increasing the salaries and multiplying the offices and thereby increasing the taxes of the people.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I concurred with the committee in this recommendation. There are fifty district judges of the United States. By the information laid before the committee, and deemed reliable, thirty-six of those fifty are employed all the year round virtually. To attempt to discriminate as to the relative value of the services rendered by each individual judge would not only be impracticable, but it would be an assumption of a power incapable of being justly exercised. The country is already aware that, by reason of the insufficient pay, judges of high character, unquestioned ability, and of great public value have felt themselves constrained to retire from the bench simply because the pay allowed by law was insufficient for their support. That has been repeated too often for the country to be unmindful of it, and has resulted in great detriment to the public service.

The salary proposed ought in my judgment to be equal as to all. I do not think it well that there should be that discrimination as to whether there was more or less labor, because sometimes you may have a very diligent occupation with very little resulting value, and it is impossible, therefore, to estimate for the public the value of decisions because they are numerous or to underrate the value of others because they are few.

I think my respected colleague has omitted from his calculation this fact, that although in some districts there is more occupation and labor for one district judge than another, yet that under the present law the judge of one district may be called in to assist another where the labors are greater than that other can perform. The district of Connecticut adjoins one of the districts of New York, and, as a matter of fact and within my own knowledge, the district judges of Connecticut have been and are oftentimes employed to sit within the southern district of New York and to assist in the greater labors imposed by the business and population of that great State. That can be done in every district. I have known the district judge in Delaware, the smallest of the districts as to population, called into the adjoining district of Pennsylvania in the sickness or absence or the overwork of the judge of the eastern Pennsylvania district. So, therefore, there is full opportunity for the enlistment of service should there be too much leisure in one district or overoccupation in another.

The salary of $5,000 a year is in my judgment reasonable and moderate for the duties in question, for the character of ability required to perform them, and for the additional consideration that there is an absolute deprivation of all other gainful occupation to the man who sits upon the bench. I am glad for one to see the judicial station made more desirable. I believe it ought to be rather the prize of the profession. Well is it for a people when the result of their institutions is to draw the highest grade of personal character and ability into the public service. I know no other way of testing the value of a government than that. The government that shall bring the highest grade of human faculty and human virtue to its service is the successful government, frame it as you please, and the government that shall result in throwing high place and power into low hands will be a failure as sure as the sun rises and sets.

Now, I do not believe that by money alone and that by the mere bid of pecuniary recompense you are to obtain high service, because you may degenerate the whole thing into a mere scramble for money, and a plutocracy may take the place of a government of law; but also do I believe that there is a just and proper medium, that shall not, according to the current rates of reward for labor and industry in the community, exclude from public station men of talent and character by reason of their poverty. There is nothing in my judgment unreasonable in the sum proposed, and there is everything to recommend it in the equality that is suggested in the bill, and which I hope will prevail.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary I satisfied myself that there ought to be an increase of the salaries of district judges in several States, and the committee undertook to regulate that increase upon the basis of the amount of labor performed by the several judges. The committee originally made the time they were employed in the discharge of their judicial duties the basis of the increase of compensation proposed. There are fifty district judges in the United States. We addressed letters to each one of these judges, calling for information as to the length of time each was employed in the discharge of his official duties; and taking that information as the basis of the several amendments allowed, we increased the bulk to a salary of $5,000, leaving only fifteen to stand at the rate of compensation now allowed by law, $3,500. The arguments that were made as to the reasons which should govern the compensation of judicial officers were accepted by the committee, and the report was made that is now before the Senate, putting all at $5,000.

My principal objection to this increase is that it raises the salaries of the district judges in the Southern States to the same compensation that is allowed in the Northern States, where the amount of labor performed is double, sometimes more than double, the amount of work done by the district judges in the South. My principal objection is that the district judges within my knowledge in the Southern States are not superior in capacity or in legal learning to the State judges, and that as a rule the State judges do two or three times the amount of work done by the district judges and their expenses in reaching their courts are much greater. The amount of compensation allowed State judges is regulated by the legislation of the several States upon the basis of the ability of the people in their present condition to compensate their judicial officers.

I acted upon the rule myself as a member of the Judiciary Committee that we can not discriminate between the judicial officers of the Government who are performing judicial duty; but the people of the States will not be satisfied if we allow so much greater compensation to the judicial officers of the Federal Government than is received by the judicial officers of the States. That is my reason for objecting to this compensation, broadcast as it is. In the Northern States, in some of the New England States, the State judges are paid as much as $6,000.

Mr. BAYARD. In the State of New York $12,000 and $14,000.

Mr. PUGH. In several States the State judges get $5,000, and the amount of labor performed by the Federal judges in those States is equal if not greater than that of the State judges. In those States I thought it was just that the compensation of the district judges should be increased, but I can not satisfy myself that it is right and proper to make a great difference between the pay of the Federal district judges in the South and in the Northern States. I believe myself that the compensation of the State judges in many of the States ought to be increased, but the Legislatures have gone as far as they thought they could go considering the ability of the people to carry their burdens of taxation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], which has not yet been read to the Senate. The Secretary will read it.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill:

Provided, That this act shall apply only to judges that shall be hereafter appointed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate, as I would rather we should get to a vote; but I will say just a word or two.

The Senator from Alabama who last addressed the Senate [Mr. PUGH] puts his objection to the increase of these salaries in the Southern States upon the ground that the States, by reason of the poverty of the people or their inability to meet other demands upon them, pay an inadequate compensation to their own local judges. I think the Senator must see, if he will reflect for one moment, conceding as he does that the State judges are underpaid by reason of the fact that the people are not able to pay them a fair, liberal, full compensation for their services, that if that be true it is the poorest reason in the world why the judge of the United States court in a State should be kept down to these poverty wages, when the Treasury out of which he is to be paid is ample to meet this demand. In other words, the people who are to pay the salaries of the United States judges, as the Senator from Alabama admits, are able to pay fair salaries. Now shall we not pay those salaries because the local constituency are not able to pay fair salaries to local judges?

Sir, the salaries that many of our district judges have been receiving have been utterly inadequate to their decent support. Most of these judges are compelled to reside in the larger cities or towns of their respective States, for there the courts are held; and it is not so much a question of how many days in the year the judge has to work; there are three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, and every one of those days the judge and his family are to be fed and clothed and his children to be educated; and he ought not to engage in business; he ought to be independent; he ought to be above the temptation to go into any other business or enterprise or speculation to eke out his short salary.

I do not think these salaries ought to be exorbitant; I do not think the positions ought to be sought as places where one can lay up money; but I do think if we are to have a respectable and independent judiciary we should pay a sufficient salary to enable the judge to live decently and to raise his family decently and give his children an education. And yet in my State, with a population of two million and a quarter, our district judge, doing the business of the entire State and holding court in four places in the State, has been living upon a salary of $3,500 in the capital city of the State. It is inadequate, and it is not fair to say to some young man who, caught by the distinction of going upon the bench of the United States, has entered upon a judicial career and has spent years there and lost all his professional associations, "If you want more money, resign your place." He has acquired the judicial habits; he has become more valuable by these years of experience, and we certainly ought to pay a fair compensation. I do not believe we can make discriminations. The salary proposed in this bill is not exorbitant. It will be but little more certainly, if any more, anywhere than a fairly decent support upon which a man can live and raise a family as his neighbors about him raise theirs.

Mr. BUTLER. I concur, Mr. President, entirely with what has fallen from the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. I think that this Government is certainly able to pay its own public servants salaries commensurate with the dignity and work of their offices; and I was surprised to hear the statement of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, that there were fifteen judges, as I understood him, in the Southern States that he thought ought to be excluded from this general increase of salary. I do not know how it is in other Southern States, but I can say that so far as my own State is concerned the district judge of the United States does as much work as almost any judge in this country. He holds court at three different points in the State—Charleston, Columbia, and Greenville. He has to traverse the entire length of the State, from the seacoast to the place of holding court at Greenville, near the mountains on the northern border, and back, and I undertake to say that he has lived and has educated his family on a salary wholly inadequate to the position which he occupies, as has been suggested by the Senator from Indiana. I am therefore entirely opposed to excluding any of the judges from the operation of this bill, and I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] for that very reason. The judge in my own State I know does as much service almost as any other district judge of the United States; but I was surprised to hear the statement of the Senator from Indiana as to the amount of work that was done by the district judge of that State. Instead of $5,000 he certainly ought to be worth double that amount, in my judgment.

The salaries of our State circuit judges in South Carolina are $3,000, and I believe in Georgia they receive $2,000. There are eight circuits in my State, with three judges of the supreme court, and yet Judge Bryan, of the district court of the United States, has two districts, the eastern and western, with circuit court powers, and with his court open almost the entire time in the city of Charleston, where the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is constantly invoked. Then he goes to the mountains, where cases of violation of the internal-revenue laws are tried; and he goes to Columbia and holds court there. Three thousand five hundred dollars is wholly inadequate. I was therefore glad to see that the Committee on the Judiciary had agreed in their report to give all the district judges $5,000 a year, and I think that is inadequate in many instances.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, when the Constitution of the United States was adopted a principle was brought into it that the United States judiciary should hold their offices during good behavior, which means during life. There was a great deal of apprehension at that time that it might turn out to work badly, for the reason that judges would get on the bench and would become steadfast there who were not fit for their positions, and who could not be removed except by impeachment. We are realizing, and in my State we have realized very keenly, the apprehensions that were expressed at the time this feature was put into the Constitution. It makes very little difference what a judge of the district court of the United States may do in his office, there is practically no chance to reach him by any process of impeachment. You may take a judge of the district court in my State and prove, as can be proved, that there have been grave and flagrant violations of duty; carry him before the House of Representatives during this session, and suppose articles of impeachment are brought before the Senate of the United States for trial and he should stand here for trial, the Congress will have expired before a trial can be had. It has got to that pitch now that a judge on the bench can do pretty much what he pleases with impunity, because he knows that while he may be amenable to censure and public contempt, he is nevertheless practically not amenable to impeachment. I regret very much that we have not the power of removing judges in some other way than by impeachment. I regret very much that the inferior tribunals at least of the United States courts are not so arranged as that judges can be retired by the expiration of a reasonable term of office. But so it is, when we get a judge now, it makes no difference what are his qualifications or disqualifications, he sticks to the bench and sticks to the people and sticks to the country, and taxes us to death to pay him for false judgments. And he has got to stay there until he dies. As the Senator from Kentucky [Mr WILLIAMS] well observed a while ago, these judges never resign. The judge is paid, of course, until he dies; it makes no difference what the nature of his physical disability may be to perform the duties of his office.

There is but one way for us to reach a matter of this kind that I can see, and that is to keep the salaries at low-water mark except in those cases where they deserve to be increased in consequence of the accumulation of public business, and in consequence, I might say, of the approbation of the country in respect of the judicial bearing and conduct of the man himself. If the Senator from Indiana feels that the judge in his State is underpaid, I will vote to tax the people of Alabama to pay him a sufficient salary, and do it upon the ground that the compensation is now inadequate, and it is my duty to vote an adequate compensation to him for the labor he has to perform and the circumstances by which he is surrounded in living.

If the Senator from South Carolina can show that his judge deserves a higher compensation, I will vote to tax his people and mine to raise it. I will vote, if he says so, to raise it four times the salary that it is now, for the Senator seems to be rather extravagant this morning in his ideas of the compensation of certain classes of public officers. If he and his colleague will get up and state in their places on the floor of the Senate that their district judge needs four times the salary that he is getting now, I will vote with them to give him that salary. But I will not vote to give the district judge in the State of Alabama an additional dollar of salary. He does not deserve it; he does not earn it. He is not the peer of any judge of the circuit bench in my State, and they get $2,500, and the chancellors get the same. I can not vote to tax my people to pay him $5,000 a year when the State of Alabama is not able to pay her supreme court judges more than $3,500, her circuit judges $2,500, and her chancellors the same. I should feel that I was outraging public sentiment in my State.

I have none of that feeling of grandeur which some Senators seem to enjoy here, that because we are in contact with a plethoric Treasury therefore we must forget the men who contribute out of their labor to its supply, and vote whatever sums of money, according to our imagination or our fancy, we may consider would be a becoming reward to men of high judicial station.

All these men accepted their offices, and not only did they accept them but after a greedy search and hunt for them they obtained them by pressure of one sort and another, and now they and their friends come into the Senate of the United States and say that they have made a great mistake in trying to raise a family decently upon $3,500 a year. If they have made a mistake let them resign. Let us pass a bill giving them salaries of $5,000 and provide that they shall go out of office by resignation, and if they have gained the hold upon the affections and the confidence of the country that is assumed by the Senators from Indiana and South Carolina there will be no difficulty in having them reappointed. But if it should turn out to be one of the results of such legislation that some of them that we let go should not be able afterward to regain their places, I for one would send up most pious ejaculations of thanks to Almighty God that something had at last happened by which we might rid the bench of the United States of some of its miserable incumbents, for that is the God's truth.

This is a subject with which I have been brought in contact now for twenty years in a way to leave anything but pleasant impressions upon my mind. The President of the United States found it necessary, in order to have repose in the Army of the United States and proper service there, to take a brigadier-general, who was a militia general, I believe, and who was cutting up in a very peculiar way, I suppose, in the Army, and give him a place upon the district bench of the United States in Alabama. From the time of that appointment down to this good day the people of my State have been instructed by an experience which I would not see repeated for any consideration that a human being could name. There is a power lodged in the hands of an officer appointed for life upon the district bench of the United States to wrong and outrage a people in the name of justice and through its appointed instrumentalities that is the worst form of persecution that ever was visited upon a free and civilized people in the history of mankind. I am not in any humor or any condition to bestow rewards upon men who inflict such injuries upon my people. Senators here may do so if they choose, but they can not do it until they have heard the facts.

I propose an amendment to the bill by which any district judge in the United States can get a salary of $5,000 if he chooses to come before the Senate and the President of the United States upon his record on the bench. How can a Senator object to allowing him to place himself in that position? That is a measure of justice; it is a measure that leads to the purification of the bench; it is a measure demanded by the history of these times, written in anguish upon whole broad States of this Union. I demand, if they get any more money out of the Treasury by holding these life offices, that they shall submit themselves to the scrutiny of the Senate, and that we shall have an opportunity of saying whether or not they have been good and faithful servants in their offices.

I am not parsimonious toward any set of officers in the United States; I wish to see them amply compensated; and yet I must confess that I think it is a bad public example to place the salaries of the great central Government of the United States very high above that which the States are able to pay. The wisdom of the people of the United States as expressed in their local affairs is quite as great as that expressed in these central bodies, in Congress. I will take the action of State Legislatures and State constitutional conventions as a better measure of general public wisdom than the action of Congress. If we cast our eye over the whole length and breadth of this great country we do not find the people in their wisdom inclined to put the salaries of their officers at an exorbitant point. Instead of following a good example set to us by the people, we are trying to set a bad example to them. We tax them without mercy. We gather where we do not sow; we reap where we have not planted. We take harvests of wrong from this people, and after we have accumulated the money in the Treasury we congratulate ourselves that we have the ability to bestow our generosity upon public servants at a rate which the people of the States have condemned throughout all their history.

I feel when I am on this floor that I am still the representative of the people who sent me here, and that I am not permitted merely to consult my own whims and caprices and fancies in piling up enormous salaries upon public servants. Besides that, it gives them a consequence and a power and a dignity, a supremacy, if you will allow the word, over men in the States who are not so well paid, both in respect to their social position and that sort of influence that the world is apt to attribute to a man who receives a high salary, which is very unjust and very disturbing in its effects. It is not wise; there is no public necessity for it.

I should like to know in any case where it can not be asserted that the labors of the district judges have been very greatly increased, what plea or pretext there is for this increase of their salaries. There are cases in the United States where judges of the district courts have very little work to do. They live in ease, elegance, and quietude. The cares of life are all removed and they have no apprehensions of the future. They know that this great Government will be able to pay them their salaries while they live. In a state of quiet repose they look down the vista of the future without a single disturbing apprehension. This is considered to be a happy state of mind——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will suspend. It becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived. The bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HOAR. I hope my friend from New Hampshite [Mr. BLAIR] will allow this salary bill to be finished. The debate has been substantially completed.

Mr. BLAIR rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, so that the matter under consideration when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived may be proceeded with.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BLAIR. I yield for formal business.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLUMB. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 559) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, to report an original bill in the nature of a substitute. I also report back Senate bill No. 559 with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the amendment reported by the Senator from Kansas a substitute for the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He reports an original bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it a substitute?

Mr. PLUMB. It is an original bill in the nature of a substitute, being on the same matter.

Mr. HARRIS. Does not that dispose of the former bill?

Mr. PLUMB. Possibly it does.

Mr. HARRIS. It is an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to avoid the printing of the original bill and the carrying of that amount of paper and array of words on the records and files of the Senate. I want to have the committee's bill printed by itself and the other bill disposed of in such a way that it will not cumber the records of the Senate.

The bill (S. 1886) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish the consent of the Senate that I may file a written report at some later day, before the matter is considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection that leave will be granted.

Mr. MORGAN. On that bill I desire to submit the views of the minority of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the views of the minority of the committee will be received.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that Senate bill No. 559, which I have just reported adversely, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1847) to authorize the issuing of a register to John S. McQuin and J. Warren Wonson for the schooner Druid, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 509) for the relief of the estate of Robert H. Montgomery, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BECK. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 968) for the relief of Fielding Hurst, to submit an adverse report. I think the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] desires the bill to be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. No; let it be disposed of.

Mr. BECK. Then I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LAPHAM introduced a bill (S. 1887) providing for the sale of navy-yard and United States naval hospital land on and near Wallabout Bay, in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPRINT OF THE STANDING RULES.

Mr. INGALLS. Certain amendments have recently been adopted to the standing rules of the Senate that require the printing of a new edition. I move that the Committee on Rules be directed to prepare a new edition of the standing rules of the Senate for immediate publication, covering recent amendments, and that five hundred copies be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1314) to change the name of the James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City, Nebr.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 4779) to change the name of the West Waterville National Bank of Oakland, in the State of Maine, to that of the Messalonskee National Bank; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SALARIES OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the judicial salary bill, which has been debated this morning up to 2 o'clock, may retain its place at the head of the Calendar of cases to be considered prior to 2 o'clock. I should like myself to finish it now, but my friend from New Hampshire, who has charge of the educational bill, learns that there are two or three Senators who would still like to speak on the judicial bill, and objects to displacing his bill so long. The bill was at the head of the Calendar and was displaced by a motion to recommit, and I simply want to have it keep its place for to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill which has been under discussion relating to the salaries of district judges shall be placed at the head of the Calendar for to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. COKE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas objects.

Mr. HOAR. Then I shall move to take the bill up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts gives notice that he will to-morrow morning move to proceed to the consideration of the bill. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. If the educational bill is in order I have nothing more to say.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move to take up House bill 3967, being the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose no such motion can be made——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves to take up at this time the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

This motion is to be decided without debate.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to ask a question. The Senator from New Hampshire insists upon his educational bill, as I understand.

Mr. BLAIR. I certainly do. I do not consider it an act of good faith to press the pleuro-pneumonia bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the proposition?

Mr. BLAIR. To displace the educational bill. Let the question be stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that at the hour of 2 o'clock the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, was laid before the Senate. The Senator from New York then moved to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals. The question is whether the Senate will agree to that motion. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called.

Mr. VEST. I wish to announce the fact that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] is confined to his room by sickness. I understood him to be paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] upon all political questions, but in arranging the pair I expressly exempted the votes respecting pleuro-pneumonia and kindred questions.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] on the bill. As I do not know how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BOWEN. I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] on the bill. I suppose my pair would extend to this vote. I would vote "yea" if he were here.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 33; as follows:

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 210) requiring the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain muster-rolls to the governor of the State of Ohio was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Education and Labor. [Having put the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not suppose the Senate understands the force of the question that is being taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a misunderstanding about it. If the Senator from New Hampshire simply wishes to substitute the amendment as the text of the original bill, there is no objection; but to adopt the amendment now as a substitute would prevent any amendment hereafter being made to the great and important bill that is now before us.

Mr. INGALLS. Except by addition.

Mr. SHERMAN. Except by addition. I think all the Senator from New Hampshire desires is that the amendment should be adopted as the text, being still open to amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senate understanding distinctly that this would be subsequently open to amendment, and the amendment becoming practically the original bill, I should like to have the question taken at once.

Mr. HARRIS. By unanimous consent the substitute can be treated as the original bill, amendable as the original bill. If the Senator will ask it, I have no doubt unanimous consent will be granted.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the amendment proposed by the committee, if adopted, shall be treated as the original bill and be open to amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAIR. That makes the substitute the original bill now, and it is in order for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In view of this agreement the Chair does not deem it necessary to put the question again. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to, with the understanding of the Senate which has just been reached.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Chair announces that the amendment is agreed to, in the parliamentary sense the text of it is not subject to amendment; it can only be amended by addition. Instead of agreeing to it as an amendment, the Senate, by unanimous consent, has agreed to treat the substitute as an original bill and to be open to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands. The question now is upon the bill, which is the substitute reported by the committee. The bill is still in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust that the Senator from New Hampshire, having made an elaborate speech containing a great number of tables, will allow this bill to be put aside with a view to go on with the Calendar. I will say to him that the Senate is in no condition to act upon a bill appropriating $120,000,000, to be distributed among the States upon the ground of illiteracy, not to be conducted by the General Government, but to be distributed $15,000,000 this year, $10,000,000 next year, and so on. This project has not been considered at large among the people. It has not been understood. The Senate is in no condition to vote upon it. Senators around me say they are not now prepared to vote upon it. I trust, therefore, that the Senator will allow it to go over so that we can think it over a little. It is too large a subject, too large an amount, too new a principle to be acted upon hastily. While Senators may not be prepared to speak upon it, they are certainly not prepared to vote upon it.

I move, therefore, that the Senate proceed under Rule IX to the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand that that motion is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is in order to move to postpone the present matter with a view to go on with the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. That may be; that is another question, and is a debatable question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to postpone the present order without displacing it as a special order, with a view to proceed to the consideration of bills on the Calendar under Rule IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio to postpone the consideration of the present order, announcing that if that motion shall prevail he will move to proceed to the consideration of the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, for some reason the calves and cattle and all manner of interests can run over the children of this country. The Senator from Ohio seems to imagine that there is a new principle and a new idea embodied in this bill. The Senate has considered the same principle involved here time and again. It has passed bills involving precisely the same principle. I think the Senator probably himself may have voted for them on former occasions. The project to grant some definite and some really substantial appropriations in the direction of the removal of the illiteracy of the country is one that was before the Senate during the entire last Congress. The Senator's own Legislature has memorialized Congress for the passage of this bill or a bill substantially like it for the appropriation of national money for the aid and support of the common schools of the country.

I assure the Senator that if he is not familiar with the ideas of this bill the country at large is familiar with the principles of the bill, and that the masses of the people of this country as I believe feel a far stronger and deeper interest in the consideration and in the success of a measure of this kind than they do in tariff questions and other important, as he will admit to be important, questions that come before us in this Congress and in former Congresses.

I assure the Senator that there are occasionally new ideas in this country and that the people are coming to consider new questions and new issues, and it is necessary to learn something in regard to them as we go along. If Senators have not considered this bill it is no fault of mine. I pressed it urgently upon my own party associates and upon the Senate all through the last Congress. I did so earlier. Leading citizens of this country, leading members of the Senate, have done it for ten or fifteen years past, and it is no new idea whatever.

Whenever we approach this bill some infinitesimal, unimportant measure is brought forward to kill it with, and all manner of adroit maneuvering as it seems to me, parliamentary maneuvering I mean to say, in which I am not a special adept, seems to be summoned to the rescue to postpone this bill.

If the Senator is not ready to speak upon it there may be somebody else ready to speak upon it. It must be that others have thought in regard to it. For one, after we have approached this bill in the face of such manifest and continual obstructions and at last have reached it and it has the right of way, and after having given way for two or three days' debate upon the pleuro-pneumonia question when I expected not more than an hour or two, and when it was antagonized with that bill itself this morning, I hope we shall not now be called upon a second time to postpone the bill in favor of other bills and other measures of infinitely less moment.

I made a speech on this bill that occupied the whole of yesterday afternoon. Two or three Republican Senators were present, one or two dozen may have been upon the other side. When this measure was before the Senate Senators had nothing to do but to be present to learn something upon one side of this question, if they had seen fit or had desired to do so. I hope that the bill will not be displaced, and that it will stay here, and Senators desiring to learn something in regard to it will have the opportunity, if they choose, to attend to the public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Ohio moves to postpone the consideration of the educational bill until to-morrow without having it lose its place as a special order, to be proceeded with as a special order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; and I propose to follow that with a motion to go on with the regular order of business on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer an amendment, to come in at the end of section 15:

> And the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

I think there will be no objection to that.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I again call the attention of the Senate to two or three important features of this bill. I do not propose to discuss it. I am perfectly willing to take the vote upon it. The bill proposes to apportion among the States $15,000,000 this year, not upon any constitutional basis, not upon the number of inhabitants, not upon the tax-paying power of the people, but upon the basis of illiteracy. Out of $15,000,000 the bill would give to the people of the Southern States $11,318,394. That money is not to be disbursed by the United States; it is not to be disbursed under the authority of the United States. The United States is to have no control over its disbursement. It is to be placed in the hands of State authorities. There is no power even on the part of the General Government to see to its disbursement, to control its disbursement, to call for an account of the money disbursed, but the money is to be placed in the hands of State authorities.

We have had some very pretty speeches made in regard to the powers of the States and the powers of the National Government. It has been doubted and denied whether the National Government had the right to protect the people of the several States from infectious diseases among domestic animals. It has been asserted that there was no power in the Constitution to authorize their destruction or to prevent infection. But here is a proposition to take money for school purposes from the common fund of the people of the United States, collected in the form of national taxes, and to make this unequal distribution among the several States, without any power or control over the money. The immediate effect of it is to place in the hands of the several States this enormous sum of money, to be disposed of by them for educational purposes.

What kind of education, what kind of ideas, is to be promulgated? Who is to control that matter? It seems to me that it is unfair and unjust, and that when the people of the country understand that this disposition is to be made of their money there will be a profound feeling of discontent. I know there is a general desire to cure illiteracy in this country, to help to some extent the Southern States to grapple with a great evil; but it seems to me that no provision could be made more unjust than this, and I do not believe, if the measure should pass this year, that it would be retained next year.

But there are other objections to the bill. This is an appropriation made for ten years. The Constitution of the United States provides for annual appropriations of public money. I have not the language before me, but the Constitution even forbids appropriations for a long period of time. Appropriations for the Army can only be made for two years. It has been the general policy of the Government year in and year out to get rid of all permanent appropriations. It will be remembered that efforts were made by a former Senator from West Virginia for some time to abolish permanent appropriations. Yet here is a provision making an appropriation permanently for ten years, without regard to the condition of the Treasury, without regard to the wants of the Government. Whether we should be at peace or at war, for ten years we must go on and make these appropriations unless we can carry a law repealing the measure.

We have over and over again refused to make appropriations for more than one year. The very safety of our financial system depends upon annual appropriations made according to the amount of money that we have collected annually from the various sources of revenue. But here in this new matter, for the first time entered upon in our history after nearly a hundred years have rolled over this country, we propose to make a direct appropriation of $120,000,000, not annually but in one mass. That ought not to be done, although it is one of the minor objections.

The second section of the bill provides:

> That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of 10 years and over, can not read and write bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; and until otherwise provided such computation shall be made according to the official returns of the census of 1880.

This national money collected for national purposes is to be paid out on the requisition of the Secretary of the Interior by the Secretary of the Treasury to the authorities of the several States; and he is to "apportion the said total sum so certified among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population and illiteracy specified in the second section of this act."

This money is to be paid upon the proper warrant "to the treasurer of the State, Territory, or District, or to such officer as shall be designated by the laws of such State, Territory, or District, to receive, account for, and pay over the same."

Under the old act of distribution, the act of 1836, where there was an amount of money in the Treasury that was already creating embarrassment and distress, and where a law was passed to distribute that money among the States, it was distributed as a deposit subject to recall. That power was even doubted and denied by a large portion of the people at the time. Here is a proposition to pay over by an unequal distribution upon a novel basis the large sum of $120,000,000, and place it practically beyond our control, in the hands of State authorities, to be expended as they see proper.

Sir, I am not one among those who seek to limit and control very much the powers of the Federal Government; but I say here is the exercise of power that ought to excite some remark from the other side of the Chamber, if indeed this measure depends not merely upon the interests of the particular States who are to receive the money to be appropriated, but upon some broad general principle of constitutional law. That is about the whole gist of the measure. Now, let us go a little further.

I frankly say to you, and I wish in legislation at least to be frank, that I am not prepared to pay over to the local authorities of the Southern States eleven or twelve million dollars out of $15,000,000 of money which belong to the people, nearly eight-tenths of which is collected from the resources of the Northern States, who are to receive no portion of that amount. Especially am I not willing to turn over this money to the disbursement of those who I fear will not deal justly with the money in the education of the masses of the people in their midst. I am not prepared to vote to the Southern States money from the public Treasury for any purpose until we have better signs than we have had for the last year or two that they are willing and feel bound to respect the rights of citizens of the United States. If I had no other reason for voting against the bill at this time, I am frank to say I should do so because I am not satisfied that if this money were placed in their hands it would be properly used for the education of all classes of the people of those States, and I am not willing to trust them to disburse the money of the United States until they respect the acknowledged rights and constitutional privileges conferred plainly by the Constitution of the United States upon all the citizens of this country alike.

Let us go further. I think, however, that I have gone over the gist of the whole bill. The fifth section describes the kind of instruction that shall be given in these schools. It shall include—geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws, and shall include, whenever practicable, instruction in the arts of industry, and the instruction of females in such branches of technical or industrial education as are suited to their sex, which instruction shall be free to all, without distinction of race, color, nativity, or condition in life.

> The art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic,

But after all the whole of this disbursement depends absolutely upon the State authorities, and the United States could claim and exercise no power of supervision.

Section 8 provides—

That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided that no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof.

That is, two-thirds of the expense of maintaining the schools shall be paid for by the National Government. In the State of Ohio we appropriate an enormous sum for the maintenance of schools, and every child has the opportunity of education even to the extent almost of what was considered a university education fifty years ago. Children can go to the high schools and from these they may easily go to the colleges. We pay that expense ourselves. We ask no aid, no assistance. Is it just and right that the people of the Northern States which have their systems established, who have at great expense built their schoolhouses which dot almost every section of land in those States, where all the children are gathered together, paid for by the voluntary contributions or by taxes levied under their own laws, as in Ohio, should be called upon to make this enormous disbursement from the common Treasury without receiving a proportionate share themselves?

If this money is to be appropriated for school purposes, why not have it distributed so that each State may have the benefit of it according to its population? If in some States they do not need it, let them then diminish their school-taxation. Shall Ohio and the older States go on and tax their people by a tax not only derived from the sinking fund gathered in the past, but by direct taxation, as our school fund in Ohio is mainly collected, and tax our property and levy various forms of school-tax on our people year in and year out, and yet pay to other portions of the country three or four or five times as much as we receive ourselves under the operations of this proposed law? It is not just or right; it is not equal.

Now, Mr. President, although this thing has been talked of in a sentimental kind of way in this country for some years; although there is a general desire, I have no doubt, to promote the education of the youth of the South, and there is a feeling of kindness, a disposition to help at least in educating the emancipated freedmen of the South; although that feeling is floating around, no doubt some time or other to be embodied in the form of a law, yet I do not think the public opinion of the United States is now prepared for any such measure as this; and if it should pass the Senate, especially if it should pass Congress, it would at once excite great agitation, great complaint, great discontent, and I do not believe the system would stand long before a general public voice would demand its repeal on the ground of injustice and inequality.

That is all I desire to say about it. I did not intend at first to say a word. I have not given much attention to the subject. I confess, notwithstanding the great efforts made by the Senator from New Hampshire, my ignorance of the details of the subject. I speak only from my general impressions, and under those impressions I do not feel myself at liberty at this time to vote for any such bill as this containing its provisions or involving so large an expenditure of the public money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is——

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I do not care to speak on the bill at any length, and I only rise, as no one else takes the floor, to make a suggestion or two in reply to something that has been advanced by the Senator from Ohio.

He complains that here is something like a permanent appropriation, which is a thing very familiar to any one connected with the financial system of the United States. I think on a moment's reflection the Senator will admit that there is nothing incongruous in making a permanent appropriation for ten years for a specific object, when by general law we have made many appropriations permanent without any limitation whatever.

Mr. SHERMAN. For the interest on the public debt.

Mr. BLAIR. That does not change the principle involved. The principle is that Congress has power to make appropriations for a continuing series of years. With reference to the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, another principle, of course, obtains, one derived from the revolution in England. The Senator says that the basis of distribution is bad, that if the money is to be distributed at all it should be upon the basis of population or the basis of valuation or something of that kind. Now this appropriation is made, if made at all, for the reason that we appropriate money to the improvement of rivers and harbors or for any other great national purpose, and we put the money in such case where the difficulty is. It might as well be urged that the appropriations under the river and harbor bill should be divided per capita among the various States according to the population or according to the valuation in the various States which contribute to the accumulation in the public Treasury, as to say that when we legislate to remove illiteracy we should expend the money which we appropriate for that purpose not where the illiteracy is and in proportion to where the illiteracy is, the evil which we would remove, but that we should put it all over the country indiscriminately and uniformly. The argument is entirely incongruous and does not apply at all.

So far as the right to appropriate the money is concerned, it seems to me there can not be any serious complaint of inconsistency on the part of our friends on the other side of the Chamber if they should vote for this appropriation and at the same time find some perplexity and difficulty in supporting a bill like the pleuro-pneumonia bill and others to which they have objected on this floor. The questions are not parallel; there is no similarity at all between the cases. The question here is whether the National Government shall so legislate as to perpetuate itself; whether it has the right of self-defense; whether it may lay foundations whereupon to build republican institutions for the discharge of the functions of the National Government itself; whether we can maintain a national form of government republican in substance—that is the real question; because intelligence is as necessary to the existence of the National Government republican in form as intelligence is necessary to the existence of the State governments republican in form.

So, then, this is a question underlying the superstructure of both forms of government. I do not need to cite authorities or to give reasons and lay down propositions to maintain a position of this kind. You may ignore the State governments utterly, the principle upon which this appropriation is made would still hold good. Were there no State governments, might not then the nation educate the children of the nation who are to become the citizens of the nation? The fact that the same individual child is to become a citizen of both governments does not deprive the National Government of its power to qualify that child to be its own citizen, to vote and act intelligently so far as the creation or the maintenance of the national powers are concerned.

In this bill there is no question of State rights; at least there is not so far as my own mind is concerned. The only question that arises here as touching the States is whether we will employ them as the agency through which this fund shall be administered. I would have been glad if my political friends had rallied a year ago, when we had both Houses of Congress and could have passed the bill with some features Republican in it that I should have been glad to have. Though I would be glad if the bill were somewhat different, still I now believe that the only practicable thing to do is to do what was done in the Morrill bill, or in the bill advocated still earlier by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]—give the money directly to the States and hold the States responsible for the administration of the school system in their limits, re-enforced as they will be by this appropriation from the national Treasury. I think that the more judicious thing to do. Trusting at all, it is better to trust fully; and I think at the present time there is no practicable way in which any appropriation can be made for the removal of this evil unless we give it virtually to the States; and by this bill we do not give it to the States without any power of review, we are not entirely without remedy.

The Senator speaks of the alarming condition of things in the Southern States, social disorder, disintegration, violation of personal rights, and so on, perhaps more sensitive on that subject by reason of his recent examination of questions of fact. That may be; but how comes he by this knowledge of the condition of the Southern States? In what way have we during the last twenty years come to send our committees throughout the Southern States to obtain the information which has from time to time so stirred the heart of the North, helped in elections, and helped us in the vindication of human rights, not always purely political considerations? We have had, as we shall have in this case, the power to investigate. The bill expressly reserves it; and if the bill did not reserve it it would still exist; and if there is an abuse in the expenditure of this money, how long will it be before the people all over the country will understand that the school funds are being misappropriated? I assure you, Mr. President, and everybody, that I think there is no cause to complain that the public mind south as well as north would not be stirred to its lowest depths by an accusation shown by the proofs to be well founded that the money of the children was being malappropriated by any of the authorities. This power to investigate is sufficient. It is all we have had in any case thus far. Let us continue and preserve that power, as we do in this bill, and I think we have the most available of any safeguards.

The Senator asks another question, and that is whether it is right that the Northern States should be called upon to contribute. Well, Mr. President, if the principle upon which we give at all is correct, I see no objection based on the fact that the larger proportion of it goes to some particular section. Suppose all the rivers and harbors were in the Southern States; would it be any less constitutional, any less proper, any less within the functions properly exercised by the Government of the United States that the appropriation should still be made and should be there expended? Suppose that an appropriation is made for coast defense; do we not tax the people of the interior? Why may they not complain, "You have no right to call upon us to help to pay for defense along the Atlantic coast?" The principle is not one which holds water better than a sieve.

I have nothing more to submit.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I think that I can offer an amendment that will slightly remove one objection which may be made to this bill. By the terms of the second section it will be seen that this money is to be distributed to the several States according to illiteracy by the census of 1880. Now, it strikes me that there may be some improvement and less illiteracy in 1890 in some States than there is under the census of 1880. I, therefore, will move to strike out, in lines 7 and 8, section 2, the words "official returns of the census of 1880" and insert in lieu thereof "last preceding published census of the United States."

Mr. BLAIR. I think there is no objection to that. It is a very proper amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. SHERMAN. That amendment will not take effect for seven or eight years, so that it is a very harmless one and not a very important one.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the bill, in the twenty-seventh line of the thirteenth section by adding after the word "thereof:"

And the other matters herein prescribed to be so reported.

This does not, I think, alter the sense of the bill, but makes it clear that making all the reports prescribed is a condition for receiving the money.

Mr. BLAIR. That is not objected to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusettts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. Before proceeding further with the bill I should like to make a formal amendment in section 2. In the fourth line I move to strike out the words "read and." The reason of this is that the number of persons who can read and the number of persons who can write are two different numbers, and the number of persons who can not write is the greater. It seems to be generally conceded that inability to write is a better test of illiteracy than inability to read. As it is necessary that the apportionment should be made upon one sum or the other, and as that apportionment will give a little more money in the Northern States and a little less in the Southern States than the apportionment upon the basis of those who can not read, I ask that the words "read and" be stricken out, leaving the basis of distribution upon the number of persons who can not write as shown by the census.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. In section 12 the words "read and" should be stricken out for the same reason to correspond with the amendment already made. At the end of the second line I move to strike out "read and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, section 1, in lines 11, 12, and 13, contains the following language:

Which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States.

I should be glad if the Senator having in charge the bill would point out where the "school age mentioned hereafter" is found in the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. It is in one of the later sections, and is the school age prescribed by law in the State or Territory where the money is to be expended.

Mr. INGALLS. I think not.

Mr. BLAIR. I know it is so.

Mr. INGALLS. Section 11, to which the Senator undoubtedly refers, declares—

That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used in the school-districts of the several States and Territories in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made.

But that refers to a different subject from that which is mentioned in section 1. There is nowhere in the bill a distinct recognition of what is to be regarded as the school age for the pupils who are to receive the benefits of this sum of $105,000,000.

Mr. BLAIR. That is a matter which can easily be rendered certain, if it is not already certain. I do not see any reason why the provision of the bill that seems to be quite explicit and was thought by the committee to be sufficiently so is not clear that the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used in the school districts on the basis here prescribed. The moneys paid over to the several States are to be distributed and to pass to the States upon a fixed basis, that is, the illiterates, as shown by the census. They are not the school children; they are the persons 12 years of age and over who can not write; so that the basis of distribution to the States is one of absolute fixed certainty. Now, section 11 refers to the fund of money after, in accordance with that fixed apportionment, it shall have been received into the treasury of the State; and it provides:

I do not myself see that the bill fails to be explicit enough.

Mr. INGALLS. Section 1 provides for the expenditure of $105,000,000 in ten years "to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States." Section 11 provides that after the money drawn from the Treasury in pursuance of the first section shall have passed into the hands of the authorities of the State, Territory, or District, it shall be distributed there upon the basis of illiteracy within that territorial area, so as to provide for "the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory." That is to say, if I understand this bill, after this money passes from the Treasury of the United States into the treasury of the State, Territory, or District, it is there to be used in proportion to illiteracy within those limits so as to secure an equalization within the limits of that State, Territory, or District of school privileges to children of the school age prescribed by the State, Territory, or District.

I have examined this bill with a good deal of minuteness; I have applied to it such scrutiny as I have been able since it has been before the Senate; and I repeat that in very important particulars it is crude, it is undigested, it will be inoperative; and as the first suggestion I call the attention of the Senator to this point in the first place the language of the bill where language is used which does not find its counterpart or correlative anywhere when you come to ascertain upon what basis the distribution is to be made.

The same objection may be found in the proviso of section 13:

Provided, That if the public schools in any State admit pupils not within the ages herein specified it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein.

It was obviously the design of the person who drew this bill to specify somewhere what should constitute school age. If it does not it is worthless. There is no sense in saying that we shall appropriate $105,000,000 to be disposed of by the people of the States and Territories exactly as they see fit. This is intended to apply $105,000,000 to the common-school education of certain classes in the States and Territories of the United States. The purpose was to declare somewhere, as appears by the language of these sections, what should be the school age, the age at which pupils should be admitted and the age when the school privilege should cease; but it does nowhere appear here, nor is there anywhere whatever in any portion of the bill any recognition of what shall constitute the school age; and I submit that without that this bill is very imperfectly drawn and this vast sum of money is very insecurely guarded.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator allow me a suggestion?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. I see the difficulty suggested by him. The bill as I understand it recognizes the school ages as prescribed in the different States and Territories.

Mr. INGALLS. Where?

Mr. PUGH. By that section——

Mr. INGALLS. Section 11?

Mr. PUGH. The section which refers to school ages.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly it refers to it, but refers to it on an entirely different basis, for a different purpose from that mentioned in section 1.

Mr. PUGH. The object of the bill was to recognize in each State the school age that the State law provided; and if you adopt, say 6 to 20 or 5 to 20 as the age within which this fund shall be applied, what would be the result? The school age is different in different States and Territories; there may be one age in one State and a different age in another. If you put in your bill a uniform age, say from 5 to 20, it would come in conflict with the State or Territorial laws in reference to the school age.

Mr. INGALLS. There we have it again, Mr. President. This money is to be paid out of the national Treasury for a national purpose, but only as the States may see fit to have it expended. They are to prescribe how this money is to be appropriated; and the Sentor tells us that in a bill to deal with a great national evil like this, upon the only theory on which we can deal with it, to expend a gigantic sum of money, the intention is to have it expended only as the States may see fit to permit, and that if we say, sitting here as the representatives of the nation, that it ought to be expended for the education of children between the ages of 5 and 20, it will create a conflict between the national authority and the authority of the States where this money is to be expended! Mr. President, I shall not vote for the expenditure of a dollar upon that theory. If we are to be told that this money is to be expended upon a national theory for the education of the children of this country, to secure us against a great danger and to rescue this nation from ignorance, and that it can only be expended as the authorities of the States see fit, I have done with the bill.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. I should like to ask him if the generous and princely gift of the United States to the State of Kansas of public lands for the education of her children contained any prescription as to who should be educated, and how it should be done?

Mr. INGALLS. The United States Government never gave an acre or a rood of land to the State of Kansas for the purposes of education.

Mr. VANCE. How, then, did the State of Kansas acquire the lands that had been supposed to belong to the Government of the United States?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. VANCE. How did the State of Kansas acquire title to those lands which had been the property of the United States and which she now uses as the basis of her school fund?

Mr. INGALLS. They were given to the Territory of Kansas.

Mr. VANCE. That is a quibble that I think the Senator ought not to resort to.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not a quibble. It has been one of the conditions upon which Territories have been admitted into the Union as sovereign and independent States, according to the phrase that is so frequently used, for a great many years past.

Mr. VANCE. Well, then, Mr. President, if land could be given to a Territory, an inchoate State, to do as she pleased with it for the education of her children, could it not for a much better reason be given to the State to be disposed of according to the laws of a mature community?

Mr. INGALLS. I shall have no altercation with the Senator from North Carolina upon this proposition. I understand that this bill is supported by its advocates upon the theory that great dangers threaten this nation on account of the prevalence of illiteracy and ignorance in various parts of the country, and that in consequence of that we are asked to make an appropriation of $105,000,000, extending over the period of ten years, to be expended in the education of the young; and the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from North Carolina by very direct inference leave us to understand that unless this money is to be turned over to the authorities of the different States to be expended or not expended as they see fit they do not propose to take it. With my consent they will never get it.

I call attention in this connection to one other proposition of this bill. I want the Senate to look at the provision in section 8, in the three lines at the bottom of the page, which declares:

> That no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof.

We are asked to vote for a bill that authorizes them to keep two-thirds of the amount allotted to them in their own treasury to do nothing with.

Mr. BLAIR. Not at all.

Mr. INGALLS. It says:

> Shall not during the first five years of the operation of this act annually expend for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof.

Mr. BLAIR. There is a misprint.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator would have passed this bill, misprint and all, if no attention had been called to it.

Mr. BLAIR. I presume we should. I think it is an exceedingly narrow and small style of construction to say that anything further is necessary to make the bill explicit enough on that point. But since the Senator raises the criticism there is no objection, and there ought to be none since the criticism is raised, to inserting "from its own taxation;" and I ask to have the bill amended in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I will see that it is put in at the proper time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Say "in addition to the moneys."

Mr. BLAIR. That is a matter for discussion.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 7, after the word "act," I move to strike out the clause relating to the Commissioner of Education and his relation to the school authorities of the District of Columbia. The section provides:

> SEC. 7. That the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the privileges of a Territory under the provisions of this act, but its existing laws and school authorities shall not be affected by the operation of this act.

Now follows:

> The Commissioner of Education shall be charged with the duty of superintending the distribution of its allotment, and shall make full report of his doings to the Secretary of the Interior.

I move to strike out the words after "act." There is no reason why a discrimination should be made between the Territories and States and the District of Columbia. There is here a broad, liberal, generous, well-supported system of education maintained at the expense of the Government and of the tax-payers of the District, with which there is no complaint. The school authorities here are recognized by the District government and by the laws of the United States; there is no large per cent. of illiterates here; and I ask that that clause may be stricken out, that no discrimination may be made against the authorities of the District or against the school system here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves to strike out of section 7 all of the words after the word "act," in line 4. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. As the Senator is charged specially, so far as the Senate is concerned, with the interests of the District of Columbia, I should not personally feel much inclined to make opposition to his motion perhaps; but it will be observed that the Commissioner of Education is only charged with the duty of superintending the distribution of the allotment, and that he is required to make a full report of what he does to the Secretary of the Interior. I do not think there could be a more innocuous method of superintending or looking after the amount that the District of Columbia would be entitled to under this act. There does not seem to be any reason for making an invidious distinction between the District of Columbia and the rest of the country by withholding any benefit from the District under the provisions of this act; and in fact I do not myself see how we can properly do it. We adopt as a basis of distribution the illiteracy of the whole country.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator does not understand me as objecting to the payment of its proportion to the District of Columbia?

Mr. BLAIR. In what way would the Senator understand, then, that this money would be distributed?

Mr. INGALLS. This provides that the Commissioner of Education shall have the control of it.

Mr. BLAIR. The distribution?

Mr. INGALLS. It reads "shall be charged with the duty of superintending the distribution of its allotment;" that is, he shall designate the schools where it is to go, interfering with the administration of the school system here by the school board, for which certainly there can be no necessity.

Mr. BLAIR. Why not substitute then "the school board" or "board of education of the District of Columbia" for "the Commissioner of Education?"

Mr. INGALLS. That is provided for in section 4:

> SEC. 4. That the amount so apportioned to each State and Territory and to the District of Columbia shall be paid, upon the warrant of the Commissioner of Education, countersigned by the Secretary of the Interior, out of the Treasury of the United States, to the treasurer of the State, Territory, or District.

Mr. BLAIR. That is not into the hands of the school board.

Mr. INGALLS. He pays it out of the Treasury into the hands of the school authorities precisely as in other cases. There is no reason why the Commissioner of Education should be allowed to come in here and superintend the distribution of this money after it reaches the authorities of the District.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator feels clear that there is any difficulty in the school authorities of the District reaching the money after it is paid in accordance with the provisions of section 4 to the treasurer, I have no objection to the words being stricken out; but it would be more explicit to substitute——

Mr. HOAR. Let me ask the Senator from Kansas if there is an officer now designated by the law—of course the District can not make any law; we have to make the necessary law—to receive this money?

Mr. INGALLS. There is.

Mr. HOAR. Who is he?

Mr. INGALLS. The treasurer of the school board, to whom it could pass from the Treasury of the United States exactly as provided for in section 4. The intention of the clause to which I call attention is to give the Commissioner of Education the control of this fund in this District independent of the school board. I am opposed to that.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to the substitution of the school board or board of education of the District, if that is the proper title of the board. Is there a treasurer of the school fund of the District?

Mr. INGALLS. There is.

Mr. BLAIR. Then the bill in section 4 does not provide for a payment to the treasurer of the school fund, but does provide for payment to the treasurer of the District. The bill ought to provide, it seems to me, that this fund in the hands of the treasurer of the District may be reached in some way by the school board. Would it not be well to substitute "the school board" for "the Commissioner of Education?"

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BLAIR. Let that substitute be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator move to amend the amendment?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Kansas has no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. No; the Senator from Kansas suggests an amendment, and he will state it.

Mr. INGALLS. Say "the school board" instead of "the Commissioner of Education."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4 of section 7 it is proposed to strike out

"Commissioner of Education" and insert "school board of the District of Columbia."

Mr. INGALLS. And to strike out "of his doings."

Mr. SAULSBURY. With the permission of the Senator from Kansas, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee who reported the bill why the District of Columbia should be included in this bill? Congress has already provided liberally for educational purposes in this District. I believe that one-half of the moneys now appropriated to the schools in this District is paid out of the Treasury of the United States; and yet it is proposed in this bill to include the District of Columbia with the States for which no provision is made out of the Federal Treasury. It seems to me Congress has already made ample provision for the education of the children in this District. I am not certain as to the amount, but my impression is that something like $400,000 is annually appropriated for educational purposes in the District. How much of that is paid out of the Treasury of the United States I am unable to say, but it occurs to me if we are going to make any appropriation of money the District ought not to come in for an additional share.

Mr. BLAIR. The District of Columbia gets money under this bill like all the rest of the country, the States and Territories throughout, upon the basis of illiteracy; that is to say, its necessity based on the ignorance that remains in the District notwithstanding the appropriations already made by the Government and by the people of the District and expended in the way of schools. There does not seem to be any reason why the people of the District of Columbia, being a portion of the nation, as well as the inhabitants of States and Territories, having needs of the same kind, should not under this bill receive equally their proportion of assistance according to the ignorance or the illiteracy actually prevailing. I do not see any principle upon which they can be exempted from the operation of the bill and deprived of their proportionate share, however small it may be. It will not embarrass them, because it goes into the general fund, and they are treated like the rest of the country.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Congress annually appropriates all the money that is deemed necessary for educational purposes in this District.

Mr. BLAIR. But the ignorance remains; the illiteracy is here; and only in proportion as it shall be found, here as well as elsewhere, will the District receive money under this bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then the suggestion of the Senator furnishes the strongest argument against the proposed appropriation contained in this bill. If year after year appropriations have been made to the full extent of the requirements of education in this District, and there still remains after several years appropriation of money the same amount of illiteracy that obtains in other sections of the country, then the statement of that fact by the Senator has furnished the strongest argument against the passage of this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator misapprehends. I did not say that there was as much illiteracy in proportion to population. I said that there was a certain degree of illiteracy remaining here. The District of Columbia is far more intelligent, of course, than those portions of the country where there has been a much less expenditure, and the bill only gives to the District, as it does to New Hampshire and Delaware and Massachusetts and Florida, in proportion to the illiteracy found here. There seems to be no reason for depriving the District of Columbia of the same benefits we give to the Territory of New Mexico or the State of Oregon.

Mr. PUGH. My friend from Delaware will allow me to suggest that the annual appropriation made for educational purposes in this District will be made hereafter of course with reference to the fact that an appropriation is made for this purpose under this bill; and certainly the annual appropriation heretofore made will not be repeated in the face of the appropriation made by this bill. The appropriation in this bill will be the one for educational purposes in the District of Columbia instead of the annual appropriations heretofore made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know how that may be. That may or may not be true. That would disturb the proportion that the Congress of the United States has acknowledged as the proportion which Congress should appropriate for educational purposes in the District. If there is any diminution in the amount of the appropriation for school purposes, it will disturb the arrangement under which the District government has been carried on for some years; but my suggestion in reference to this bill was simply that there might not be any special favoritism to the people of this District, because I did not believe it was necessary. I am, however, opposed to the bill upon principle. I am not opposed to it upon the suggestion that was made by the Senator who first opened the discussion on this bill this morning, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], on the ground that it would give to the people of the Southern States an undue proportion of this money. I oppose it not upon that ground, nor do I oppose it on the ground suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] that it would place money under the control of the State authorities.

My opinion is if any appropriation of money is made it ought to be placed under the control of the State authorities in the States that are to be the recipients of this bounty. But I am opposed to it because I believe that the object proposed is not one for which we can properly and legitimately exercise the taxing power; and this proposition is not simply, as was the proposition in 1836, to distribute a surplus in the Treasury, but it is a proposition that there shall be annually appropriated out of the money hereafter collected into the Treasury the sums of money specified in the bill.

I do not believe that the educational interest of the people of this country is one of the legitimate objects of Federal taxation. I do not believe it was contemplated at the time the Constitution of this country was adopted that the taxing power should be exercised for any such purpose. In my opinion we have just as much right to exercise the taxing power for the purpose of feeding and clothing the children of this country as we have for their education. I am not opposed to education. But it is not a proper object for the appropriation of money out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator sets up a distinction between the money that was distributed in 1836—some $28,000,000, I think—among the States and this money proposed to be given in futuro, because he says that money was already in the Treasury and this is not there yet. But does it not all get there by precisely the same process?

Then can the Senator establish any distinction between the right of the Government to give this money growing out of the fact that in one case it has it already in possession by a certain process and in the other it proposes to obtain it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not propose to enter into a discussion as to the right to have made the appropriation which was made in 1836. That was a question upon which there was doubt expressed at that time, but it has been too long past now to reopen the discussion of that question. I am discussing this bill, and I call on the Senator to point out that provision of the Constitution, that specific grant of power, which gives to Congress the right to impose taxes on the people of this country for the education of the children of the country. So far as I understand the Constitution, no such power exists. I do not subscribe to that latitudinarian doctrine which would, under the clause relating to the "general welfare," exercise the taxing power for any purpose that might suit the whim or caprice of Congress.

I learned my notions of the Constitution in a different school, in that school which holds to a strict construction of the powers of the General Government. I believe that the intention of the framers of the Constitution was to grant only such powers to the General Government as were necessary to carry on the Government, and that those powers are such as are specifically granted or such as are necessary to carry out the granted powers, and that the powers granted must be strictly construed. I do not believe that there is any warrant in the Constitution upon the mere whim or pleasure or caprice of the Congress of the United States to take money out of the Treasury for every conceivable purpose, however humane or charitable such purpose may be, nor do I believe that education in the aggregate would be promoted by this appropriation.

Education is necessary and is a proper thing, but education, like other benefits, is appreciated by the people to some extent according to what it costs them. If parents and communities are relieved of all responsibility and expense in the education of their children they will feel less interest in their education.

I do not believe that we ought to take a dollar of this money. I shall vote against the bill. I know my State would get perhaps a just proportion of the money distributed under this bill, but I am here to carry out what I believe to be the best interests of the country according to the powers that we have under the Constitution, and I do not believe that it will promote the education of the children or that we shall decrease illiteracy by this appropriation of money.

How is it in this District? Congress has year after year been appropriating large sums of money for the education of children; and yet we see them on the streets; we know what class of children they are. There are white children and colored children on the streets, with all the advantages of education afforded to them, as illiterate to-day as in any portion of this country; and, sir, you may appropriate not only this $105,000,000, but you may appropriate $500,000,000, and until the people of the various localities themselves determine to educate the children of their communities you will not have it done.

I shall vote against the bill, however it may be amended. The suggestion which I made in reference to the District of Columbia I thought was a proper one to perfect the bill if it shall become a law.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. I do not wish to enter into the discussion. The bill goes on the theory that the money will be distributed according to the illiteracy of the children of school age?

Mr. BLAIR. No; the illiteracy of persons of 10 years of age and upward, whether adults or not.

Mr. LOGAN. Call it school age. The point I want to get at is that there is nothing in this bill that requires the different States before they become the recipients of this donation from the National Government to by law require all the children to have education to attend school; nor is there anything in this bill that would prevent the money from being distributed to States where by their statute law a certain class of people are prevented from entering certain classes of common schools. To illustrate what I mean, take the State of Kentucky. There the colored children are not permitted, as I understand, to receive the benefit of taxation derived from the property of white people; they are only permitted to receive education from taxation that is applied to the property belonging to the colored people. In a bill that I proposed I had a provision that required that all children should receive education under the law, colored and white alike in the common schools. I wish to see a provision of that sort in this bill. I wish the Senator to understand that I am not antagonizing the bill, but am only making these suggestions so that they may be reflected upon and that it may be seen whether the bill does not require amendment in that particular.

Mr. BLAIR. In reply to the suggestions of the Senator from Illinois, which I understand to come from a friendly source, I will say that in reference to the State of Kentucky I am informed, and I think I am correctly informed, that its present Legislature has changed the law in regard to the distribution of the school funds of the State. I shall be glad to be corrected by the Senators from the State if I am wrong, but I think I am not. The law now is that all children, irrespective of race or color, share equally in the proceeds of the school tax of the State of Kentucky. The only other State where a different system of distribution of school money obtained was the State of Delaware. Whether any change has been made there perhaps the honorable Senator who spoke last [Mr. SAULSBURY] will be able to say. I do not know.

But with reference to a provision for compulsory education there are but very few of the Northern States even that have now a compulsory school law, so called. Even in the Northern States where those laws exist they are not enforced to any better extent, to say the least, than the laws which prohibit the indiscriminate sale and use of intoxicating liquors. In other words, compulsion does not compel any better than prohibition prohibits. Where you have a compulsory law you do not secure the attendance of the children at school anything in accordance with the design of the law, and those compulsory provisions have not obtained in the school system in any but the most advanced, if I may use the expression, relatively the most intelligent States. A compulsory school law comes along as one of the later outgrowths and benefits resulting from general education when a sufficient mass of the voters are so intelligent that they will insist that children shall all attend school and make a law to that effect. They will not leave it to the will of the parent, who oftentimes wants the work of his child more than he desires his education. Taking the States of this country in their present condition it would be practically impossible to enforce a compulsory school law. We might, I think, perhaps almost as well not make this appropriation so far as the States which would be most benefited by it are concerned as insist as a condition precedent on the enactment of a compulsory State school law. I think that in the first place the lack of school-houses, the lack of teachers, the lack of everything that appertains to the school itself, is an insuperable difficulty. To make a law that the child shall attend when there is no school in existence for him to attend would certainly be inconsiderate and premature legislation.

We ought, I think, to remember that this provision which we are making is for communities which so far as the education of the masses is concerned are in a very rudimentary condition, anxious to escape from it, anxious to build up common schools, in no better condition than was the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania about 1830, 1831, 1832, and 1833 when they had no common-school system even there. They then established it. A few of the more intelligent men succeeded in enacting a system into law by action of the Legislature, but the mass of the people of the State opposed it with such violence that it was the political death of almost every one of the members of the Legislature who in the ensuing session stood by the system and opposed its repeal. It is well understood as a historical fact that the school system of Pennsylvania was saved only by the masterly eloquence and effort of the late Thaddeus Stevens. The men who under the spell of his eloquence and the vigor of his arguments voted to sustain the school system went home to their political deaths, a very large number of them. That was only so long ago as about 1833 in our own adjacent Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, a Commonwealth where to-day probably a compulsory school system could be enforced. And yet if it were required of other communities, perhaps of two-thirds of the States of this Union that they should enact a compulsory school law, we should have no common schools whatever; and if we had power to make such a law and enforce it, probably two-thirds, certainly one-half the States of the Union would be very likely to refuse, at least under compulsion, to enact such a law.

We may well expend a few millions a year for ten years, and then we shall find that though we have made very great progress we have not reached the goal. I think there may be some failure to apprehend the serious conditions with which we are dealing. I have reflected much myself upon this proposition, which I supposed would be suggested, of requiring a compulsory system to be adopted in every State of the Union before the provisions of this bill could be made applicable; and my judgment is that it is better, far better, not to do it. I think the result would be that in those States most needing the appropriation the appropriation would utterly fail.

I do not know but that there was one other suggestion of the Senator from Illinois to which I have not replied. If so, if he will mention it I will speak to it. But there is one other matter to which I will allude while on the floor; and that is in regard to the amount which the bill requires that each State shall expend of its own money in order to secure the advantages of the appropriation proposed in this bill. The entire period of time covered is ten years. The bill provides that no State shall receive appropriations under it unless for the first five years it shall expend from its own taxation—it can be so amended as to specify the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas—at least one-third of the amount that it receives under the provisions of this bill. There are quite a number of the Southern States that at the present time are not raising and expending a much if any larger sum than one-third of their proportion under this bill. The State of Alabama is now, I think, raising a little over one-third and a little less than one-half of the amount of money it would receive under the provisions of this bill. Perhaps it may have attained to one-half. If so, I do not know that there is any State which is not at present raising and expending from local taxation one-half the amount it would receive the first year when the $15,000,000 are distributed under the provisions of this bill.

There is a spirit of anxiety arising in all these communities to educate their children. I think they are stimulating themselves in the direction of taxation as largely as they well can bear. I think the provision for the first five years is well enough in the bill, and for the remaining period of the term the bill provides that no State shall receive anything which does not raise and expend as much of its own money as it will receive under the provisions of the bill. I consider that a matter of secondary importance; but if it is thought best to increase the proportion slightly, I shall not object. I think it ought not to be increased so as to embarrass those States which, as I endeavored yesterday to show, are subjecting themselves to as great or greater taxation than we are in the North, and certainly as much taxation as we are in the North in proportion to their ability to bear it, for school purposes. I think, I say, it is hardly well to require of them as an exaction a larger expenditure of their own money than the bill provides for now.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I do not wish to seem unnecessarily critical in the consideration of this bill. For, as the Senator from New Hampshire well knows, I sympathise with the general object and purpose he has in view; but I should like to hear from him how under the terms of section 8 any portion of this money could be paid out until five years had expired?

No part—

Mark the language—

No part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend, &c.

How can you ascertain whether or not the States do annually appropriate so much for five years unless you wait until the five years have expired? I submit to the Senator from New Hampshire that technically under the language of this section it is not possible that one cent of this money shall be drawn from the Treasury until the expiration of five years from the passage of the act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. BLAIR. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, line 4, after the word "the," it is proposed to strike out "Commissioner of Education" and insert "school board of the District of Columbia," and in line 7 of the same section to strike out "of his doings;" so as to read:

The school board of the District of Columbia shall be charged with the duty of superintending the distribution of its allotment, and shall make full report to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment requires the vote of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I move, in line 13 of section 1, to strike out "of the school age mentioned hereafter" and insert "between the ages of 5 and 15 years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, if the Senator has ever been in a colored school he probably has seen pupils all the way from 5 to 40 years of age, and the older the more industriously were they conning their books and endeavoring to acquire knowledge to be useful to them in the remainder of life.

This bill by a provision later along expressly provides that no child of school age shall be deprived of its benefits, and no person shall be deprived of its benefits for the reason that he or she is not within the school age of the State. The bill is made that way because it is easy to see that without some provision of that kind it would be in the power—I think not the disposition, but it would be within the power—of any one of those who might administer this law to exclude from its benefits a very large class of the ignorant colored population of this country who are exceedingly anxious to obtain the benefits of common-school education.

The Senator by his amendment proposes that this money shall be distributed among those in the various States who are between 5 and 15 years of age, and he would exclude from the benefits of this appropriation all who are not included within those ages. Otherwise there is no occasion whatever for the amendment. There is no available paper by which the numbers of children within the United States included within those ages can be ascertained. There are no data in the census; there are no data in the local school returns; there are no data in possession of the State authorities, and none anywhere from which the number is ascertainable; and it would be necessary if the amendment should prevail, as the first condition to the practical operation of the bill, that a census should be taken of the persons in the United States between 5 and 15 years old. Then the schools throughout the country have got to be broken up and remodeled, and only those included in a school where this money appropriated by the United States is to be expended who are between the ages of 5 and 15.

The school ages in this country vary. From 4 to 21 years is the age in Texas, if I recollect aright. In my own State, by a recent enactment, the school age is from 5 to 15. In many States it is from 6 to 17; in some from 6 to 18; in some from 5 to 18. The school age is found to be various in different portions of the country under the State laws and the Territorial laws, for I think there is no State or Territory where the common-school age is not prescribed by law. The bill, as I think, with sufficient explicitness already provides, first, that the distribution shall be made to the States upon the basis of illiteracy. That is not the basis of school population at all; but it is taken as a test indicative of the need of education within the State; and the actual enumeration of illiterates is of all persons 10 years of age or older who can not write. Upon that basis, ascertained by the census, the money is first carried to the treasury of the State. Then, under the direction and control of the State authorities, subject to report to the General Government and to the right to investigate and all that, and to a forfeiture of their appropriation if they are found to have misapplied it in any given year—under all these safeguards the expenditure is to be made within the State for the purposes of common-school education to all the children within the State, irrespective of race or color or previous condition, and in such a way, as far as possible, as to equalize the educational accommodations and give to all substantially the same opportunity for education. In some localities it may be necessary to expend a larger proportion of money, because schools may be more expensive in those localities than in others. It may be possible to find suitable instructors for a school district back among the mountains by paying $15, $20, $30, or $40 a month to a teacher, and get just as good instruction as would be obtained where it would be necessary to pay twice that sum of money in the larger places. We know that the laws of political economy operate in all parts of the country alike. The purpose is to give to each child substantially the same opportunities to be educated and qualified for the duties of citizenship and of private life.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that his school age of 5 to 15 will operate to exclude from the benefits of this appropriation all the colored people over 15 years of age, and the effect of it will be to operate entirely against that class of illiterates. The school age in my State is from 5, I think, up to 20, and is made as high as 20 for the purpose of embracing that class of illiterates among the colored people. I am satisfied that he does not intend that effect to be produced. The class of colored people above 15 years of age very much need the benefit of school education. I object to that change.

Let me make another suggestion in regard to section 8, as to the meaning of that section in relation to the expenditure of the amount appropriated during the first five years. I think it would be well to amend it by inserting after the word "expend," in the ninth line, the words "out of its own revenue;" so as to read:

That no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not during the first five years of the operation of this act annually expend out of its own revenue for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof, and during the second five years of its operation a sum at least equal to the whole amount it shall be entitled to receive under this act.

Then under section 13 the Senator will see how the information is derived by the Federal Government as to the State having complied with the terms prescribed in the eighth section.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will see that even with his amendment the section is still inaccurate.

Mr. PUGH. I thought the Senator would make it clear.

Mr. INGALLS. "Annually expend out of its own revenues," as amended by the Senator from Alabama, "for the maintenance of common schools," as it now reads, "at least one-third of the sum." It should be amended by inserting after the word "schools:"

An amount equal at least to one-third.

Mr. PUGH. That is satisfactory.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no objection to that.

Mr. PUGH. There will be no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. Let that be fixed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas regulating age.

Mr. INGALLS. With the consent of the Senate, upon the suggestions already made, I will modify my amendment, if the Chair will permit me, by making it read: "between the ages of 5 and 20 years."

Mr. BLAIR. Well, Mr. President, I should like to be heard upon that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas modifies his amendment. The amendment will be read as modified.

The SECRETARY. In line 13, section 1, after the word "children," strike out "of the school age mentioned hereafter" and insert "between the ages of 5 and 20 years."

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas to put it "21" instead of "20."

Mr. INGALLS. Very well; "21."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. BLAIR. I object to the amendment under any circumstances. It will only make confusion and "confusion worse confounded," and will operate against the colored population of this country, numbers of whom attend the common schools after they are 21 years of age. I wish every human being who desires to attend the common schools of this country, so far as they are aided by this act, to have the opportunity of doing so, even if he is over 21 years of age. There is a very large number of people who will be benefited by leaving the bill as it is.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, Mr. President, as the Senator from New Hampshire has based his opposition to my amendment upon the ground that the colored people who are above the age of 21 will be excluded thereby, I shall be pleased if he will tell me how they would be included under the terms of the bill as he interprets them. He says that this money is to be distributed for the purposes of the education of school children in the United States between the school ages prescribed by the States and Territories. It is not claimed here by any Senator that the school age is defined by any State to extend to a greater age than 21 years. Therefore the intelligent but uneducated colored man of 40 would not be permitted to come in and pursue his studies even under the interpretation suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I ought undoubtedly to have gone further, and called the attention of the Senate to the proviso at the conclusion of the thirteenth section, on the fourteenth page, which covers the point, so far as it can be covered, which I desire to retain in the bill.

Provided, That if the public schools in any State admit pupils not within the ages herein specified, it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein.

Mr. INGALLS. The public schools can not admit pupils except under the laws of the State.

Mr. BLAIR. They do.

Mr. INGALLS. It can not be supposed that this bill confers on the public schools within the States the authority to admit anybody they please, irrespective of the school age prescribed by the State. It seems to me that the proviso, instead of relieving the difficulty, intensifies it.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will consult the school returns from the State of Massachusetts he will find that a very considerable number of scholars attend who are outside of the school age of that State. The law prescribes a certain school age, but by common consent, there being facilities and there being a necessity and there being the desire on the part of the pupils, they are admitted; they attend school; they get the benefit of the schools. In just the same way it is the fact now, I think, in every State—I have no doubt in every State of the Union—there are more or less of the schools' pupils attending who are over the school age prescribed by law. Certainly it is true in my own State, where the age is from 5 to 15, that a very large number of scholars attend up to 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22 even. I remember attending common school myself where there were young men 23, 24, and I do not know but 25 years of age.

The Senator would reach the point which he wishes to cover and leave the bill just as it is now really, but still he would have a prescribed school age that would include all the school ages within the United States, if he should say "from 4 years to 21;" but I am not sure that that would not occasion considerable confusion in administration. I think it very much better to leave the bill as it is, allowing pupils to attend the schools of the school age prescribed within the States, with this provision at the end of section 13:

That if the public schools in any State admit pupils not within the ages herein specified, it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein.

Allowing the bill to stand in that shape will leave room for the continuance of the generous practice which obtains now everywhere, and obtains so largely in the Southern States, where the colored schools are, of admitting pupils above the prescribed school age, even after they are adults. I think we ought not certainly by a provision of this national law to interfere with the liberal practice that already obtains in the several States.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this bill at length, but I rise for the purpose of making one suggestion in reference to the section as to illiteracy and as to the age of the school children. When I read this section and understand it if I do, it reminds me of the proposition that in the Congress of the United States the people are to be represented according to the population of the different States, but if any portion of those people are deprived of certain civil rights, then the representation of the State enforcing the deprivation shall be reduced accordingly. So this bill goes upon this principle that the appropriation of money shall be based upon the illiteracy of the people, no matter of what age they may be, but shall only be applied to those of certain ages in the schools.

Now, according to the theory of this section of the bill where the bulk of the colored men reside, in the South, you appropriate money based upon the illiteracy of the whole. We all know that the colored people could not read and write prior to the war, and but few of them can since. Hence you base the provision on the illiteracy of those people. In the North nearly all our people read and write over the age of 21. Hence the South receives a larger appropriation, based on the colored illiteracy, than the North, as applicable to children. The meaning of this provision is—and I object most seriously to that—to appropriate money, for which the people of the North are to be taxed, based on the illiteracy of people who may be 90 or 100 years old, not for their benefit, but for the benefit of others. That is the proposition, and I object to it most seriously.

I submitted a proposition for the appropriation of money from the Treasury for the education of the children of the whole country of school age. Why? Because the white and the colored alike of 5 years old are illiterate. So a proposition of that kind is just and equitable. It applies with equal force to the white and the colored. But when you base it on the illiteracy of the whole, and then you take money from the Treasury based on the illiteracy of those who can not attend school for the benefit of a few States who refuse to tax themselves for their own benefit, I object to it. The fair and just proposition is, if money from the national Treasury is appropriated, that it shall be appropriated to apply equally to all the children of the United States, white and black. That is fair.

Let the appropriation be based on the illiteracy of the children, not the illiteracy of the grown people, who do not attend school. That is an unfair estimate, an unfair taxation of the people who pay the taxes in this country. If it is based on the illiteracy of children between the age of 5 and 20, then it applies equally to all everywhere; it is just then to the colored man and just to the white man. Any other proposition is the character of proposition that I mentioned. For instance, to-day under the Constitution and the laws of this country the representation in Congress is based on population, but there is a provision that if the people are deprived of the exercise of the elective franchise the representation shall be reduced in proportion. Yet in States where the elective franchise is not exercised by the colored people a Representative in Congress chosen at an election where 5,000 votes were cast stands equal to one chosen by 25,000 votes. The same principle exists in this bill, that is, there shall be a donation from this Government based on the illiteracy of those who can not and will not attend school, instead of upon the illiteracy of those who do attend school. That is in exactly the same ratio as the bad faith which permits the election of a Representative to Congress on a vote of 5,000 people when you require twenty or twenty-five thousand in other quarters.

I say that all children, both colored and white, are illiterate (to use the common term) at 5 years old. Hence where you apply that test of age it applies equally to all classes, white and colored; but when you go beyond that to those who cannot be educated or attend school, it is unfair, because the illiteracy is down there, and then an unfair proportion goes to those people not for their benefit, not for the benefit of those upon whom the expenditure is made on account of their illiteracy, but for the benefit of white people down there as well as colored people.

Mr. SHERMAN. The point which the Senator from Illinois makes is perfectly just and perfectly fair; still I want to call his attention to this one difficulty: if he puts a limit below 10 years we have no information as to the number of people who are illiterate between 5 and 10, because I suppose the census-takers would naturally assume that all below 10 would be illiterate.

Mr. LOGAN. I am speaking of the bill as it has been amended. It has been amended to read from 5 to 21 years.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, no.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator without his consent.

Mr. LOGAN. It is no interruption.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say if the apportionment is made upon the number of illiterate people North and South between the ages of 10 and 20 years it would largely remove the injustice of this proceeding, because the number of illiterate persons above the age of 20 years and who can not go to school manifestly ought not to be made the basis of the apportionment. The Senator from Illinois is perfectly just on that point; but if the basis of illiteracy is taken upon all between the ages of 10 and 20 years, the apportionment would undoubtedly be in favor of the South, where the colored people are and where they have not had the benefit of education; yet it would be much less marked than it is according to the present basis, because under the basis now made by the bill between eleven and twelve million dollars in round numbers is given to the Southern States the first year and only $3,000,000 to the Northern States. It would not take long before such a distribution as the bill proposes would be seen to be so manifestly in favor of the South, considering the preponderance of population in the North, that it would create profound discontent, whatever the Senate might think of it. But if you take the number of illiterate children between the ages of 10 and 20 in all the States, and base your allotment upon that number, then the disparity would not be so great, and it would be just, because it is those people who are to be educated and not those above the age of 20.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Why draw the basis on illiteracy? Why not make it the children of school age; that is, between 5 and 20, who are the persons who need education in this country? Under the bill you base the apportionment upon the illiteracy of all over 10 years of age. That will give each child of school age in the South at least four times as much money per capita as a child in the North of school age.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It would probably be more than that, because the illiteracy there over 10 years of age is very much greater.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If you are going to give anything at all from the national Treasury, why not give to each child in this country of school age alike, whether white or black, without regard to illiteracy?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from California asks why not give it alike to all children of school age. I was remarking before that the proposition I made to the Senate of the United States was exactly that proposition, and I will read it. The language that I used, and the language that I would use now if I had the amending of the bill, is as follows:

For the education of all the children living within the United States.

That was the proposition I made.

Mr. MILLER, of California. That is fair.

Mr. BLAIR. That would take $150,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not make any difference whether it would take $10,000,000 or $500,000,000, one child is as much entitled to education as another, if it needs it.

Mr. MILLER, of California. One needs it just as much as another.

Mr. LOGAN. One needs it just as much as another. So I proposed that all children of school age in the United States should receive education and that the appropriation should be made according to the population; in other words, that it should be distributed according to the population, reckoning the children of school age in the States and the Territories, so that the basis of the distribution and the basis of the appropriation should be according to the number of children in the United States who required education; that not only the appropriation, but the distribution should be made according to the number of children in the United States, and that taxation in the different States should be regulated in reference to the appropriation made by the Congress of the United States.

I am not the enemy of this bill; I am only making suggestions as to what I think ought to be put in the bill; that the appropriation shall be made applicable to the children who are to be educated; that the basis of distribution and the basis upon which the appropriation should be made shall be that basis, and not upon the illiteracy of all persons over the age of 10. By this provision nearly every colored person over 40 years of age would be considered illiterate in the South, and the appropriation would be made based upon their numbers in the calculation, and not upon the number of children or those who had to be educated.

Sir, I insist that it is unfair and unjust to the colored people as well as the whites for this very reason: The appropriation is made for the Southern States, based upon the illiteracy of the black people, for the benefit of the whites. You make your appropriation based upon the illiteracy of the old people of the black race, but when you come to distribute it in the South you give it to the whites as well as to the blacks. You use the black man to get the appropriation, and then you give it to the white man. Make your appropriation based upon the illiteracy of the black man; then if the enumeration of the black man obtains the appropriation, give that money to the black man's children, if you want to deal fairly and justly with them.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, the bill endeavors carefully to avoid all recognition of distinctions of race or color. There is no appeal to Northern or Southern prejudice in the bill. Illiteracy is taken as the basis of distribution, because illiteracy is the only mathematical, available, pertinent measure of the necessity of the case, and it is only because there is a necessity that there is any appropriation whatever justifiable.

If we are to give at all we must give relatively to the need. As I said earlier, we put our money for rivers and harbors where the rivers and harbors are. All over this country and all over the world the principle in taxation is recognized that the man who has money must pay the taxes. It is not the man who has the children who is to educate the children; but the assessable property of the entire community, very largely vested in the hands or in the ownership of individuals who have no children, is made answerable for the education of the entire mass, because it is essential to social life.

The principles that are advanced here are as I think entirely erroneous. They are not recognized and they ought not to be recognized in any system of the administration of laws anywhere. The Senator from Illinois says that we get the money because the black man is ignorant, and then expend it for the white man. Suppose that that is all true and that we obtain a larger aggregate of money in the South for the reason that there has been more of ignorance there among the colored people than the white people, the aggregate amount of ignorance is all the time the same. An ignorant colored man is just as dangerous as an ignorant white man, and an ignorant white man is just as dangerous as an ignorant colored man. The matter of ignorance is not a matter of race or color so far as the effect upon society is concerned. If there is a difference the white man is more dangerous because he is more likely to be criminal than the colored man. Therefore, if the colored man's illiteracy is made the measure of getting more money, it is made the measure of getting more so far as he is the inferior of the superior race and suffers most when that superior race is ignorant and violent.

Take this measure of illiteracy which Senators complain of, the major portion of illiteracy being among the blacks rather than among the whites, if you follow it to any legitimate conclusion it tends to the benefit of the colored man rather than the white man. Suppose you distribute your money in the Southern States upon the basis of white illiteracy, the colored man would be the sufferer because there would be the less money there and the white man would be less civilized, and being more violent than the colored man, the latter would suffer more than he now does.

Illiteracy is taken as the basis to determine the relative necessity of the different States, and then, after the money is distributed among the different States, it goes equally to the white and to the black child. When this money is applied to the scholar, to the removal of an existing status and to the amelioration of an existing condition and to the elevation of the races, it is applied, just as it ought to be, dollar for dollar to the child, white or black, and without any reference whatever to this invidious race distinction to which the Senator appeals and which offensive principle I think he would ingraft in this bill. There is no justice in it; not the slightest.

Suppose we adopt the principle that this money should be distributed upon population. I admit if we are to make the matter of education a national subject, if the nation is to take possession of the schools and is to take the children wholly from their A B Cs all the way up and furnish all the money, there is justice, there is propriety in the principle that is advanced. But I have not drawn the bill nor do I support the bill on the idea that the National Government is to interfere permanently with the education of local communities. It is only a measure of temporary aid. As I said before, if we were to adopt the idea of expending fifty, one hundred, one hundred and fifty, or two hundred million dollars annually and if we were shelving upon the national shoulders the entire burden of the education of the national child and the to-be national citizen, I should advocate the principle advanced by the Senator from Illinois. But this is proposed to be merely a measure of temporary aid addressed to an existing evil, an effort to elevate the depressed conditions of various portions of the country until we can place the whole upon something more nearly approximating a level, an average, a point from which for the future all the children of the country may start with a fair chance in the race of life; and then after that let the local community that will not educate its children sink; let it share the fate of Sodom; I care not what becomes of it. I would obliterate such a community from the face of the earth if I had my way. But we know the conditions which now exist in the country, and I think we know something of the duty that devolves upon those who are able to meet this exigency and to contribute toward it.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator think that there is any necessity of extending Government aid to the New England States, for instance? In other words, are not the New England States abundantly qualified to educate their children? Is there not a sentiment in the New England States which will result in the appropriation by the State authorities of all the money that is needed to educate their children? I speak merely of the New England States because I assume that they are able to educate their children. Will the giving of this Government money to the New England States upon the plea of aiding them in the education of their children, in the opinion of the Senator, have any effect in stimulating a higher degree of education in those States?

Mr. BLAIR. Of course the necessity is less in the New England States for the reason that the masses are much better educated already and there is a much larger amount of wealth or a much greater source of taxation for the maintenance of schools. Yet if the census is at all reliable it is a fact that there is a great deal of illiteracy prevailing even in New England, and those States do not give to their people that degree of education which it would be for their good to receive.

It was thought to be necessary to adopt some general principle of distribution. That of illiteracy was deemed the best measure. The actual necessity exists in a lesser degree in the New England States, to be sure. By this bill the State of New Hampshire, in regard to which I may speak, would get some $26,000 to $30,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars in New Hampshire expended as the bill provides it may be, in the education of teachers, in the qualification of teachers, in the support of normal schools, would give us three normal schools where we now have but one, and we need them. I do not think the State of New Hampshire would reject this money. I do not think there is an absence of necessity for the expenditure of that amount of money, or even more, for that matter. The fact is that the State does not raise the money, and the normal schools and normal education, the training of teachers, do not exist as a matter of fact. The Senator will find that he is not better off in the State of Connecticut than in the State of New Hampshire, and so all through the New England States. What I say now with reference to those which perhaps generally will be thought to be the best off educationally of any of the Northern States is true of the remaining Northern States. The amount of money that will be received under this bill will do a mighty deal of good for the Northern States if it is expended there as it ought to be.

After this distribution is made, if it should ever be made, of $15,000,000 upon the basis of illiteracy—after that is all done, what will be the proportion? I ask the attention of the Senator from California to what I now state, and I ask the attention of all Senators, for there were but few of them here yesterday; and there has been no point that has been suggested to-day, I think, which was not met in what I said to the Senate yesterday. I ask the attention of the Senator from California to this statement, that even after $15,000,000 shall be divided upon the basis of illiteracy, the individual child, the colored child and the white child of course alike, will receive for his education in California, combining the national and State assistance in one sum—the individual child of school age will receive in California $15.12 annually; in Colorado, $14.34; in Connecticut, $10.71; in Nevada, $14.40; in New Hampshire, $10.07; in Rhode Island, $11.36; in the District of Columbia, $13.61; in Massachusetts, $19.21; while in Alabama he will receive $3.64; in Arkansas, $3.13; in Florida, $3.75; in Georgia, $4.03; in Kentucky, $3.67; in Louisiana, $4.96; in Mississippi, $4.09; in Virginia, $3.94; in West Virginia, $4.31; in North Carolina, $3.26; in South Carolina, $5.05. Even after the distribution is made the Northern child will receive $3 where the Southern child will receive $1 for his education, taking the average; so that with all this provision the Southern colored child as well as the Southern white child is still left greatly to the disadvantage as compared with the Northern child.

I wish to say further, for it covers the whole case, that at the South the colored man's average of property is less than $5 to-day. The average of the Southern population, including the colored, is $155. The average wealth by valuation of the population of the whole country is $337, and in New England it is $667 I believe. In the Territories it is $225, I believe. I do not know that I can state the figures accurately without reference to the tables contained in to-day's RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. What does the Senator state to be the average of the colored population?

Mr. BLAIR. I say they do not average $5 apiece. The census does not show it in regard to population, but I will give you my data in regard to that. It has been stated on the floor of the Senate, I think in the last Congress—at all events I have a speech of the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] in which he said, and the State superintendent, Mr. Orr, repeats the same statement, that the colored people have accumulated since the war some $6,000,000 of taxable property in the State of Georgia and have done well. They had nothing. They have earned their living upon low wages and they have saved some $6,000,000; and that is all the taxable property they have there. The amount of that per capita of the colored people in the State of Georgia is about $5. There is no other State in the South, as the colored people testified before the Committee on Education and Labor last fall, where the colored people are as well off as they are in Georgia, at least they think not. Some think they are better off in North Carolina.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question about the fact he has stated?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I want to understand it, not to interfere with his argument. Does the $6,000,000 owned by the colored people in Georgia mean all their property or does it mean their taxable property?

Mr. BLAIR. It means all taxable property. It is their valuation.

Mr. HOAR. So when the Senator says that the colored people of the South are not worth more than $5 apiece on an average, he means the return of valuation for taxes?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Not their actual property, so that it would not include personal property and household effects exempt from taxation?

Mr. BLAIR. If you value the boots and shirts of Northern people you can add very essentially to the figures which I have given.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator made the statement that the colored people of the South were not worth $5 apiece. That struck me as a very serious statement, and I wanted to know whether he meant that or whether he meant something else.

Mr. BLAIR. I mean that the colored people of the South are worth not exceeding per capita of assessable property $5 each. I have an idea that a man is worth more than $5, that a woman, that a child is worth more than $5; but that is what the colored people are worth for taxable purposes.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I wish to ask the Senator a question. According to his calculation, he says that when this distribution is made, taking the amount of State aid in California to schools with this aid given by the General Government, each child will receive about $15.

Mr. BLAIR. Fifteen dollars and twelve cents in California.

Mr. MILLER, of California. How much of that comes from the State?

Mr. BLAIR. Nearly all of it.

Mr. MILLER, of California. How much?

Mr. BLAIR. I will tell the Senator in a moment. The expenditure per capita in California, as the Senator will see by table No. 22 in to-day's RECORD, in 1881 was $15.12. I have the return on which the table is based. There is nothing taken from the revenues of the United States for California.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I hope not. I hope they will not get anything from us.

Mr. BLAIR. You will get just as much as you would if it were not for this bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. This bill does not hurt California at all.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am much obliged to the Senator for that assurance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will please address the Chair. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to indicate to the Senator from New Hampshire the difficulty which I have about this bill and without saying how I shall vote upon it; but to my mind we can only justify ourselves in the appropriation of the Government money to aid in the education of the children of this country upon the ground that the States are unable or unwilling to educate their children, and I do not know but that I would put it upon the ground of their being unable to do it. I could justify my action in voting away the money of the Government of the United States for the education of the children in those States that were fairly unable to educate their own children; but I can not justify myself in voting the money of the United States to be used in the education of the children in those States that are abundantly able and willing to educate their own children. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he believes that in New Hampshire or Connecticut or New York there is one single child of the school age who can not obtain at the expense of those States a competent school education?

Mr. BLAIR. I do.

Mr. PLATT. And are not those States willing to appropriate from their own treasury all the money that is necessary to educate those children? I do not see that this basis of distribution which the Senator provides here is a just one at all; and I think I represent the sentiment of the State of Connecticut when I say that the State of Connecticut does not want any of the money of the Government of the United States to aid in the education of the children of the State of Connecticut. I do not say that they will not take it; I do not say that they will refuse it; but I say that if there be a State in the nation that is for any reason unable to educate its children, the State of Connecticut would very much prefer that the amount of money appropriated by this bill which would come into the treasury of the State of Connecticut should be paid to that State and that the State of Connecticut should have none. This basis upon which the distribution is made, as it seems to me, is one which has no foundation in justice.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? He is putting to me a speech. I ask the Senator if his State took its proportion of the $26,000,000 distributed in 1836? New York took its and made a $4,000,000 fund for school purposes, and there is where New York got ahead, and yet there is one assembly district in New York city where there are 2,500 children who can not get into a schoolhouse.

Mr. PLATT. As the Senator from Delaware said, this is not exactly the time to discuss the propriety of the distribution of that money in 1836. I always had my opinion about it. I always felt that the Government had done a thing that it ought not to do. I do not understand that that money was paid by the Government to the States; I understand that it was loaned to the States; that they avoided the difficulty which confronts us in this bill by loaning that money to the States. I understand that the State of Connecticut took the money which was so loaned to them and that they divided it up between the towns, loaning it to the towns, and that the towns have kept it as a deposit fund for the benefit of schools, and that it can be returned to the treasury of the State of Connecticut; that the towns are under obligations to return it to the State treasury when called on, and the State to return it to the Government Treasury.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator says that the State of Connecticut, that New England, does not want any help from the National Government. For five generations of school life at least has he or any citizen of Connecticut ever proposed to return it since this necessity existed, if it ever did exist, of using this money for school purposes?

Mr. PLATT. They have always been ready to return it.

Mr. BLAIR. Has the Senator in his national capacity, or has any Representative of Connecticut in his national capacity, representing the interests of the Government, said, "Here is a million dollars nearly in the State of Connecticut that she has no further need of?" With the necessities of the war upon us and with $1,500,000,000 of public debt to-day, has any public man of Connecticut ever undertaken in behalf of the interests of the National Government which he represents here to call on his State to pay over the million dollars that she has had the use of for all these years?

Mr. PLATT. The State of Connecticut, as I said, has always held that money subject to the call of the General Government. I think it is quite time for a creditor to pay money when it is demanded of him or when he is asked to pay it; and the fact that the State of Connecticut has not rushed forward and made itself conspicuous in offering to pay back the money when none of the States had been called upon for it has I think nothing whatever to do with this question.

Mr. BLAIR. I only put the question to the Senator because he raises the point, and no other Senator has, that New England needs no money, and that this money which comes from the National Government ought to be rejected because we do not need it. It is a pertinent citation to the question of principle involved, it seems to me.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator does not understand my point. It is that this money should be used where it is needed, and sadly needed, as I agree. I know of no reason why the New England States, why New York or Pennsylvania, why the Western States, why the State of my friend from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], who I see is listening to me, should not be excluded from this distribution, and that the money should be put just where it is needed and where only the expenditure of it can be justified.

Mr. BLAIR. Here comes the Senator from Illinois who says every dollar of this money must be distributed upon population; here is the Senator from Connecticut who says there should be no money paid out except only where it is needed; and this matter of necessity is a question upon which we may differ; it is a question upon which the judgment of different Senators may arrive at different conclusions. I think the necessity is in the Northern States as well as in the Southern States, relatively less to be sure, but we must have some principle of distribution; and how are we to make those invidious distinctions which it is proposed to make by the suggestions of the Senator? Will he exclude New Hampshire? For one I would be very glad to have $25,000 up there to help along our normal schools. Our people are not so thin-skinned as to object to receiving it, in my belief. We took $600,000 in 1836 anyway, and it is up there in the State now, and we do not propose to return it, and nobody proposes to return any proportion of the $26,000,000 then distributed. We know that very well. There is no Senator who acts upon any other theory than that that money is to remain where it is, outlawed, if that is a possible thing to be done, and you can never arrange that. We all know that it is gone and that it will stay gone.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he will yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BLAIR. I will with this suggestion to the Senators who are raising objections here which I answered yesterday, that between now and to-morrow they will read the speech of mine in to-day's RECORD. ["No!" "No!"] Very well; or that they will withdraw their opposition to the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to know if the Senator from New Hampshire makes that a condition precedent to the adjournment? ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. BLAIR. Then, of course, I understand that the opposition to the bill will be withdrawn, because it is hardly fair to reject a bill which is already well established in an argument that is before the Senate in print.

Mr. PLUMB. Before the Senator from Tennessee insists upon his motion I should like to make one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee withdraw his motion to adjourn?

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw it for the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. The discussion of this measure has, I think, developed a sufficient contrariety of opinion to clearly indicate that there ought to be further action by the committee, so as not to use the time of the Senate in discussing matters so much in detail. Therefore, for the purpose of getting the bill in a shape where it is more likely to meet the consideration of those who are in favor of the principle, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] is entitled to the floor, and only yields for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I make the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. Then the bill is the order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. PLUMB. I understood that the motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was only withdrawn to enable the Senator from Kansas to make a suggestion.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from New Hampshire having yielded the floor to me for the purpose of moving an adjournment, the Senator from Kansas could not take the floor for the purpose of making the motion he has indicated.

Mr. PLUMB. I understood that the Senator from Tennessee had withdrawn his motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I did, in order that the Senator from Kansas might make his proposition.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not yield the floor for anything but a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the position of the Senator from New Hampshire. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor, pending which he consents that the Senator from Tennessee may move an adjournment.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not yield for any such motion as that suggested by the Senator from Kansas. The committee has had the bill under consideration several times——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire will be entitled to the floor to-morrow morning. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the privilege be granted to the Committee on Law respecting the Election of President and Vice-President to appoint a day for the consideration of bills reported by them. At the request of the committee, therefore, I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday, the 22d day of April, may be assigned for the consideration of bills upon the question of Presidential count and succession, and that their consideration be continued from day to day until disposed of, not to antagonize revenue bills, appropriation bills, or bills from the Committee on Public Lands, or prior orders.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 75, making appropriation for the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease, for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. DIBRELL. I object.

Mr. RYAN. I hope the gentleman will not object to this reference.

Mr. DIBRELL. I shall not object to its reference to the Committee on Agriculture. I do object to the reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. OURY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for reference to the Committee on Rules a resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 29th day of March, and that Saturday, the 31st day of May, 1884, be, and the same are hereby, set apart for the consideration of legislation for the several Territories, not to include the consideration of bills of a private character, nor bills having for their object the organization into States of any of such Territories, nor to interfere in any manner with the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless it also excepts reports from the Committee on the Public Lands I shall object to it.

Mr. DUNN. It should also include revenue bills and prior orders among the exceptions.

Mr. CASSIDY. It is proper that the Territories should have a time for the consideration of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the reference of the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless it be modified as suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas I shall object.

Mr. OURY. I will accept the modification.

Mr. DUNN. As I have said, it should exclude revenue and appropriation bills, bills from the Committee on Public Lands, and all prior orders.

Mr. OURY. I accept the modification.

The resolution as modified was referred to the Committee on Rules.

JAMES SWEET NATIONAL BANK, NEBRASKA CITY.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1314 to change the name of the James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City, Nebr., and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of the James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City, a corporation transacting business in Nebraska City, Otoe County, and State of Nebraska, shall be changed to the Merchants' National Bank of Nebraska City, whenever the board of directors of said James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City shall accept the new name by resolution of the said board, and cause a copy of said resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act, and that all the expenses incident to such change, including engraving, shall be borne and paid by said bank.

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act contained shall so be construed as in manner to release the said James Sweet National Bank from any liability or affect any action or proceeding in law in which said bank may be or become a party or interested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was read by its title a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WEAVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. TALBOTT. By instruction of the Committee on Naval Affairs I wish to submit the following resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Tuesday, April 1, and on Wednesday, April 2, the House take a recess at 5 p. m. until 7.30 p. m., and that the session of each evening until adjournment shall be devoted to the consideration of bills and resolutions reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs or upon the Speaker's table over which the Committee on Naval Affairs may have jurisdiction, except Senate bill 698 or other bills authorizing the construction of additional steel cruisers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORRISON, Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WARNER of Ohio, and others objected.

Mr. TALBOTT. I hope gentlemen will not insist upon their objection.

Mr. MORRISON. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the objection made by several other gentlemen has been withdrawn.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I object.

PRINTING OF JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand several joint resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Iowa, and ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD for the information of the House. They are addressed to the Forty-eighth Congress. They are very short.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to have them read?

Mr. WELLER. No. I only ask that they be printed in the RECORD. They are brief.

Mr. KEIFER. What is the subject?

Mr. WELLER. One relates to the liens of judgments obtained in the Federal courts and the other one to interstate commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to their printing in the RECORD?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object.

HEYL'S DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. COX, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 211) to supply Congress with Heyl's United States Duties on Imports; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT RICHMOND, VA.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for present consideration, the bill (S. 1473) to enlarge the United States custom-house at Richmond, Va.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist on his objection.

THE LATE DR. EDUARD LASKER.

Mr. CURTIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to submit the privileged report which I send to the desk.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I call for order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will come to order.

Mr. KEIFER. It is impossible for us to tell whether the report is a privileged one or not until we hear it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report. The Chair does not know whether it is privileged or not.

Mr. KEIFER. I presume the question whether it is a privileged report will be reserved until it is read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All points will be reserved.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the message of the President of the United States, together with the correspondence of the State Department and certain resolutions submitted in the House, all referring to the death of Dr. Eduard Lasker, late an eminent citizen or subject of the German Empire, has considered the various matters referred to it, and reports:

The resolutions adopted by the House on the 9th of January were intended to express to the German Government and people sympathy for the death of an eminent man who died in this country, who had served his native land as a member of its highest legislative body, and as a tribute of respect to his memory.

While your committee is of opinion that said resolutions should have been received and transmitted in the same spirit of cordiality and good-will by which they were prompted, it refrains from expressing an opinion as to whether the course pursued by the authorities of the German Empire in regard to them was or was not in accordance with the proprieties governing the internal regulations of said empire, as a matter not within its province of consideration.

The dignified position assumed by the Department of State merits and will command the confidence of the country, fully sustaining the high character which that Department has maintained since the organization of the Federal Government.

As to the resolutions offered on the 10th day of March, your committee is of the opinion that they contain language, under present circumstances, superfluous and irrelevant, and not necessary or proper to vindicate the character or dignity of this House.

Your committee therefore reports back said resolutions with the recommendation that they lie upon the table, and reports the following resolutions with the recommendation that they be adopted as a substitute therefor:

Resolved, That the resolutions referring to the death of Dr. Eduard Lasker, adopted by this House January 9 last, were intended as a tribute of respect to the memory of an eminent foreign statesman who had died within the United States, and an expression of sympathy with the German people, of whom he had been an honored representative.

Resolved, That the House, having no official concern with the relations between the executive and legislative branches of the German Government, does not deem it requisite to its dignity to criticise the manner of the reception of the resolutions, or the circumstances which prevented their reaching their destination after they had been communicated through the proper channel to the German Government.

Mr. CURTIN. I move the adoption of the resolutions reported by the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. Although I think it very doubtful whether this is a privileged report or not, I do not desire to make the point, except to say I think this ought not to be made a precedent for future reports. I have no objection to the report being considered, and do not make the point that it does not present a matter of privilege.

Mr. RYAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to call the previous question.

Mr. CURTIN. I think it is quite unnecessary to discuss the report, and I call the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist on the previous question on the resolutions. We have made apologies enough for being insulted without making this additional one.

Mr. CURTIN. I insist on the call for the previous question. I will say, however, in answer to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], that there is not one word or sentiment in the report or resolutions which can be construed into an apology to anybody.

Mr. REAGAN. If the resolutions mean anything they mean an apology. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CURTIN. I am sure if my friend from Texas will examine the resolutions carefully he will find that they contain no apology.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] moves the previous question on the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COX, of New York. Would it be in order to move to lay the whole matter on the table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion would be in order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think that would be the right way to treat the German chancellor. I move to lay the whole business on the table and so get rid of it. He has insulted this Republic. Let us dispose of it in that way.

Several MEMBERS. Wait till the previous question is ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York make his motion now to lay on the table?

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, sir; I ask that the vote be now taken on laying the whole matter on the table, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] desires to speak.

Mr. KEIFER. Let the previous question be ordered first.

Mr. GUENTHER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] to yield to me.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he desires to debate the report? Of course if the motion to lay on the table were agreed to that would cut him off.

Mr. HUTCHINS. We do not want any debate.

Mr. CURTIN. If I had desired to debate I would not have called the previous question.

Mr. COX, of New York. I presumed so, and therefore I made my motion.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. COX, of New York, to lay on the table, there were—ayes 83, noes 125.

Mr. WELLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Iowa not to insist on that.

Mr. WELLER. At the suggestion of the gentleman from New York who submitted the motion to lay on the table I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question on the adoption of the resolutions.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore stated that in the opinion of the Chair the ayes had it.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for a division.

The ayes rose; but before the count was completed,

Mr. REAGAN said: I do not ask for further count.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been ordered by the vote of the House.

Mr. OCHILTREE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OCHILTREE. I wish to inquire whether the action of the House in ordering the previous question cuts off all debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not. Under the rule, after the ordering of the previous question fifteen minutes are allowed for debate on each side.

Mr. OCHILTREE. I ask to be recognized to make a few remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. OCHILTREE].

Mr. CURTIN. I would ask the gentleman from Texas whether he is for or against the resolutions?

Mr. OCHILTREE. I will show to the gentleman how I stand on this question in the very few minutes allowed to me. I think he will know before I get through whether I am for them or against them.

Mr. CURTIN. I want to know now whether the gentleman is for or against the resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. OCHILTREE. I am against the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. CURTIN. Then you are entitled to fifteen minutes of time, and can take it at once.

Mr. OCHILTREE. Thank you. [Laughter.] If I am entitled to it I will keep it. This is an American House of Representatives, and not a reichstag.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, after the previous question has been ordered thirty minutes is allowed for debate, fifteen for and fifteen against the proposition. The Chair recognizes Mr. OCHILTREE for fifteen minutes in opposition to the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. OCHILTREE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to no gentleman on this floor in my confidence and esteem for the distinguished members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordinarily I am disposed to rely implicitly upon their judgment in routine matters affecting our relations abroad; but, sir, this affair has gone beyond the domain of "red tape and circumlocution." It has assumed a phase that calls upon each and every Representative upon this floor to look to it that his individual honor and dignity are preserved, and in preserving their own to defend that of the people we represent.

It is not becoming, sir, to the dignity of this body to enter into any explanations whatever as to the meaning of the original resolution; it speaks for itself. The semi-apologetic tone of that portion of the resolution reported from the committee is unworthy the Representatives of this great nation.

Mr. Speaker, my connection with the introduction of this resolution renders it proper that I should give expression to the views that prompted me thereto.

Among the many who have raised their voices for the advancement and amelioration of the great body of the people of the Old World no one has been more conspicuous than Eduard Lasker—a man of humble birth, of a proscribed and persecuted race, who had elevated himself to a high position in a country wherein heretofore only those claiming the most exalted aristocratic lineage had been enabled to achieve eminence. What had impressed me most forcibly about him was his advocacy of constitutional government at home and his relations to well-regulated liberty everywhere else in the world; not radicalism, not socialism, but constitutional freedom. I do not believe there was another German so profoundly versed in the great principles of Anglican and American liberty as was Dr. Lasker. As a writer alone, and a thinker, apart from his active political life, he was entitled to the tribute paid him by that resolution. I mean that such a compliment would not have been amiss had he left nothing upon record except his wonderful literary labors.

Suppose Matthew Arnold had died suddenly under the most painful circumstances during his late visit to this country, would a resolution of condolence in honor of his memory have been regarded with disfavor? Say, instead of Arnold, Lord Coleridge or Herbert Spencer. None of these men ever wrote anything surpassing Lasker's lectures to the working classes or his powerful essays on constitutional or budget questions. Suppose that Charles Sumner had visited the continent during the time of the San Domingo imbroglio and had died there under the same untoward circumstances as did Eduard Lasker, would resolutions of condolence from a foreign parliament have been unseemly? All who are cognizant of the differences existing at that time between the President of the United States and the great Senator are well aware that the most extreme feeling of antagonism existed between the two; and yet is there one within the sound of my voice who would believe that the hero who had shown at Appomattox the grandeur of a great soul, he who knew so well how to temper his mighty victory with sweet mercy, would have answered a resolution of condolence passed by any foreign legislative body on the death of the accomplished Massachusetts Senator other than in that generous and forgiving manner practiced by the ancients—"De mortuis nil nisi bonum?"

The impress of Lasker's intellect and character is in every just law that has passed the German Parliament within the last fifteen years, and even the great chancellor was at times compelled to depend upon his powerful aid to carry through many of his most important measures that at the time were imperatively demanded for the unification and consolidation of the German Empire.

The words which Lasker spoke at the coffin of his friend Twisten, October 18, 1870, well apply to himself:

> Fifty years of his life were devoted to the fatherland. Again after fifty years the nation will weigh the words of the man, and judge what part of them be worthy to be handed down to posterity. We expect history to confirm our judgment; we are convinced that coming generations will esteem him a true champion of right, liberty, and the grandeur of his fatherland.

His entire political course was sustained by an unshaken faith in the happy future for the fatherland and the liberal development of free institutions.

The last of his greater, unfortunately unfinished, work related to the elucidation of the idea of liberalism in contrast to the partisan aims of the conservatives, and was an illustration of the two fundamental dogmas of progress and of reaction.

Says Hanel:

> The substance of his fruitful life was a free, unselfish service to fatherland. His highest ambition that the institutions of the re-established powerful empire might be sustained by the spirit of justice, of tolerance, of liberty of conscience, and love for mankind. This work is our heritage.

Lasker was a poor man all his life, and derived his livelihood from hard work as a lawyer and a writer. He despised riches, and worked for the people regardless of his own interests. He was known as the people's lawyer, because he always appeared for the poor without fee.

> Unskillful he to fawn, or seek for power,
> By doctrines fashion'd to the varying hour;
> Far other aims his heart had learn'd to prize:
> More bent to raise the wretched than to rise.

A compliment to Lasker is a rebuke to the prince chancellor, for Lasker was personally and politically the antithesis of Bismarck. The present incident in itself shows of what base metal the chancellor was molded. A courtier, cold, haughty, and insulting to the representatives of the people, he has ever been a subtle flatterer and sycophant to royalty. There is not an instance in his whole life where he ever of his own accord espoused the rights of the people against the usurpations of the crown. He has never lost an opportunity to denounce popular sovereignty and constitutional government. The proudest boast of this man of "blood and iron," who could have said with Napoleon that he was the Rudolf Hapsburg of his own family, is that he and his have served the royal family of Prussia for over two hundred years.

The poet Coleridge well described such a man as one possessed of "intense selfishness—the alcohol of egotism." Of course such a man can see a high political principle at stake when the representative body of the Great Republic recognizes and pays tribute to Eduard Lasker, the advocate of liberal ideas and constitutional government. The two principles, liberty on the one hand and despotism on the other, are incompatible and can not coexist in the same country. The spirit of liberty is an attribute of strength wherever it exists; it speaks in winning accents to the hearts of men, and nerves them to assert their freedom and the right of self-government. Well may this proud and partisan instrument of despotism seek to shut out the moral influence of America's example from the hearts and minds of the German people, brought to view in this demonstration of honor to the humble citizen Herr Lasker, whose purity of character, devotion to liberty, and exalted talents she holds in higher admiration than all the orders of nobility, all the stars and garters, and all the vast wealth conferred upon her obedient and serviceable chancellor. High principle, indeed—a principle of absolute imperialism, which can not withstand the power of the moral influence of the Americanism of government.

Mr. Speaker, when upon the sad news of the sudden and painful death of this great and good man, as it were in our very midst—for only a few days before he had stood upon this very floor and received respectful homage from many of the most distinguished members of this body, and none more earnest than the kind and cordial welcome of the Speaker himself, whom you so worthily represent to-day [Mr. BLACKBURN, of Kentucky, in the chair]—was it to be wondered at that I should in the line of precedent, as I shall attempt to show, have thought fit to lay that humble tribute upon his bier? The exigency was such that I thought it better the resolution should be introduced and passed without reference to a committee, never for a moment deeming that there could be the least objection urged thereto. Indeed, I took occasion to consult with a distinguished member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a gentleman who has honored the nation and himself as the representative of our Government at one of the leading capitals of Europe, and at a court as jealous of its dignity and as careful of its prerogatives as any other in Christendom.

The only surviving member of Herr Lasker's family, a noble and devoted brother, happens to be one of my constituents, and it was there in the bosom of his family that I had the honor of knowing, closely and intimately, the many admirable traits, the high aims, and exalted virtues and patriotism of the dead statesman.

And only a few days since I received a letter from Mr. Moritz Lasker, in which he quoted a portion of one received from the deceased, wherein he spoke kindly of the services I had been enabled to render him during his short sojourn at the capital, and I read it without I hope any imputation of egotism, but simply to show that my heart as well as my judgment was enlisted in the presentation of that resolution:

> Mr. OCHILTREE offered me his kind services, and has, without any shadow of ceremony, introduced me to President Arthur, the ministers of State, and to a number of Senators and Representatives, especially to the Speaker, Mr. CARLISLE. Judge REAGAN also, after vainly looking for him for two days, I met with to-day in the House of Representatives, and his personality made a most striking impression upon me.

My suggestion to the distinguished member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, as to the advisability of the introduction of this resolution, met with his instant approval, and upon my expressing a wish that he should draw up one that would be proper in all respects, he replied that, as I was possessed of a knowledge of the circumstances, I had best do so myself, whereupon the paper was formulated. Good or bad, as it may be, whether calculated to wound the sensibilities or to disturb the technical ideas of etiquette of the great chancellor, was not the question or motive with me. Little one recks when throwing a garland into the open grave of one who had done only good to his fellow-man whether the act would be repelled with the thrust of a bayonet. And yet there have been parallels, and one has been brought to my mind by this incident.

When King Charles IX of France, after the massacre of the Huguenots on Saint Bartholomew's Day, had viewed the mutilated body of Admiral Coligni, whose hand in hypocritical assurance of friendship he had warmly pressed only a few days before, one of his courtiers called attention to the fact that the corpse was decaying fast and had become offensive in its odors. "Let that be," said the crowned monster, "a dead enemy always smells good to me."

My motive, I reiterate to-day, was one purely and entirely of condolence and a pledge of sympathy and amity to the great country which Herr Lasker represented. Although I do not feel called upon to adduce precedent for the introduction of this resolution, I will take occasion to briefly cite a still more unusual if not more flattering homage paid to the memory of one of America's greatest sons. On the morning after the news of the death of Benjamin Franklin reached Paris, June 11, 1791, Mirabeau arose in the Assembly, and in one of those grand perorations that stamped him as the greatest orator of his time, among other expressions he said:

Political cabinets have but too long notified the death of those who are never great but in their funeral orations. The etiquette of courts has but too long sanctioned hypocritical grief. Nations ought only to mourn for their benefactors. The representatives of freemen ought never to recommend any other than the heroes of humanity to their homage.

La Rochefoucauld and La Fayette rose immediately and seconded the motion of the orator, which was adopted by acclamation. It was further resolved that the discourse of Mirabeau should be printed, and that the president of the Assembly, Abbé Sieyès, should address a letter of condolence to the Congress of the United States. To this letter, in compliance with the instructions of Congress, Washington sent a reply, in which he said that "so peculiar and so signal an expression of the esteem of so respectable a body for a citizen of the United States whose eminent and patriotic services are indelibly engraved on the minds of his countrymen can not fail to be appreciated by them as it ought to be." What a contrast this dignified and noble answer of the immortal Washington is to the ungraceful and petulant reply of the arrogant chancellor!

Again, I read from the proceedings of the Senate of the United States (then, I believe, in executive session after the adjournment of Congress), wherein resolutions of condolence were sent to the Government and family of the Czar of all the Russias:

DEATH OF THE CZAR OF RUSSIA.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution and to have it read for information at this time, when I shall ask that it lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be reported.

The resolution was read, as follows:

"Whereas the Senate of the United States of America, now convened in special session, has been informed of the death, by unlawful and inhuman violence, of His Majesty the Emperor Alexander II of Russia:

"Resolved, That the Senate unites its voice with that of all civilized people in denouncing assassination as a means of redress for any grievances, either real or imaginary.

"2. That, remembering and cherishing with satisfaction the relations of genuine friendship that have always existed between the people and the Governments of Russia and of the United States, to the strengthening and maintenance of which the late emperor has earnestly contributed his great influence, the Senate extends to the Government and people of Russia its sincere condolence in this sad national bereavement.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate deliver a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, with the request that he communicate the same to the Russian Government."

And yet there seems to have been no objection urged in all that mighty realm when this message of sympathy was presented, because perchance they were indicative of sympathy for the death of one who ruled by divine right, because they were written on parchment and bore great seals of state, and were delivered by befrilled and befurbelowed courtiers at the very foot of the throne of the great Peter. Is it to be supposed that we intended by those resolutions of condolence to convey to the successor of the unfortunate Czar an indorsement of his policy of absolute government, any more than we intended to indorse German liberalism or to reflect on the chancellor's policy in passing the resolutions expressive of respect and sympathy for Germany when death deprived her of the great patriot Lasker? See how the polite and accomplished minister of the Emperor Alexander responds.

DEATH OF THE CZAR OF RUSSIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 4, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate, a copy of the response of the Russian Government to the communication made to it, by the United States minister at St. Petersburg, of the Senate resolution of the 15th ultimo on the death of the late Emperor Alexander II.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR, &c., &c., &c.,

[Inclosure.]

ST. PETERSBURG, March 5 (O. S.), 1881. [March 17, 1881.]

[Translation.]

ST. PETERSBURG, March 5, 1881.

SIR: I have submitted to His Majesty the Emperor the letter you addressed to me in order to transmit to me the vote of the Senate of the United States of America on the occasion of the horrible crime under which has fallen the benefactor-sovereign whom all Russia weeps for to-day.

My august master has been profoundly touched by this mark of respect for his beloved father and of sympathy with himself, coming from the high assembly of a country for which the deceased emperor always professed a sincere esteem and warm friendship. It is a legacy which he leaves to the Emperor Alexander III, and which his majesty, in accord with the Russian nation, accepts from the bottom of his heart.

Will you, sir, give this assurance to the Senate of the United States, while transmitting to it the thanks of my august master?

Receive at the same time, &c., &c.,

GIERS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the communication lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Now, it has been asserted that the passage of the returned resolution was not called for, because Dr. Lasker did not occupy that position of eminence that would justify such extraordinary action on the part of this House. In reply to this I shall quote to you a few words as to what was said at his obsequies in New York by two of our own countrymen, Andrew White, president of Cornell University, and ex-Senator Carl Schurz, neither of whom needs any introduction from me, and both of whom have in times past represented this Government with honor and distinction in the most responsible and important positions both at home and abroad. President White, for years the honored minister of the United States at Berlin, said:

It is now four years since I saw for the first time him to whom Americans today pay the last sad tribute. He stood in the Parliament of his country, nominally the representative of its metropolis, really as the representative of a constituency far greater and wider than that; for wherever on German soil men struggled for reason against unreason, for justice against injustice, for right against wrong, there were the friends and constituents of Eduard Lasker.

Soon afterward I came to honor him as a friend, saw him in his own house and in mine, discussed with him political problems both German and American, and my respect for him became deeper still. He was indeed a German to his heart's core; but he was more than that. He represented something broader than the German Empire, something higher than its interests. His sympathies were extended to liberty throughout the world, his faith rose to an ideal of the high destiny of man.

But let us look at his career more closely.

First, then, he represented the idea of liberty, rational and constitutional; not liberty which finds its joy in carnage, not liberty which springs from the caprice of a mob, not liberty which produces fine speeches and nothing more, but liberty rejoicing in industrious peace, based upon principles, secured by institutions, insisting not only upon rights but upon duties.

Next, he represented the idea of progress; not a wild progress, secured by noise and chicanery, but a steady progress, secured by order and thrift and based upon the application of justice and law.

He represented also the idea of reform: not of reform by vague declamation, or by the trick of shielding partisan friends and exposing partisan enemies, but by thorough study of the defects of his own country and the excellences of other countries, by fearless exposure of malefactors, whether high or low, whether of this party or of that, by an honest struggle against that greed for place or pelf which in this century is the main agent in debauching legislation.

And, finally, he represented the elevation of man: not by going back to romantic ideals, not by making of existing society a heap of ruins, with schemers or dreamers "orating" from its summit, but by steadily increasing the sum of truth and justice in laws, in institutions, and in the hearts of men.

Such was the man; and for such an apostolate he was well equipped. As a writer and scholar, he took high rank in a land richly endowed with writers and scholars. As an essayist, he took a wide range. The first of his essays in the volume most recently collected is upon the dealing with state problems and world problems. Following this are discussions philological and biological, and finally brief treatises upon the best methods of instruction. Broad as the field was, he brought to every part of it deep and conscientious thought.

As a statesman, few equaled him in the work of adjusting society to a new time. As a debater, no one among those eminent statesmen of the first days of the empire surpassed him in keenness and vigor.

My friends, as we stand by his coffin there must come upon all of us whose souls are not hopelessly closed a vivid sense of the brotherhood of man. There lies one, born far from us, separated from many of us by abysses of race, language, creed, custom—yet in the highest sense our brother. This brotherhood he recognized. No barriers of creed could shut out from him the view of it. Never was he more vigorous than when he stood up for the rights of Roman Catholics in Parliament; never more eloquent than when he stood by the grave of his Protestant friend Twisten. He came of that race which has upheld for thousands of years, against all temptation, all sophistry, all obloquy, all cruelty, the idea of the Divine Unity. And he loved his race; but he rose superior to all the environments of race and creed. Like Baruch Spinoza and Hugo Grotius in the seventeenth century, like Moses Mendelssohn and Gotthold Lessing in the eighteenth century, so did Eduard Lasker in the nineteenth century belong to the good and noble and true souls who have labored to make this earth better and more beautiful, who, whether Jew or gentile, form the true elect of mankind, the very Israel of God.

Well might we praise Lasker's eloquence with which he swayed the minds of his peers in the Prussian Diet and in the German Parliament, and fortified opinions or remodeled them; his ever-armed readiness to meet the unexpected; his cutting criticism, and the adroitness in debate with which he knew how to confuse and overpower an antagonist. All this has brought him well-merited praise, but it was not this which has endeared him to the German people. It was not only the master in parliamentary fencing which the people honored in him. It revered in him far more the earnest man, who devoted his whole mind, stored with vast knowledge, to the service of the fatherland. It honored in him the jurist who found the means in his own deep, comprehensive knowledge not to become a law trickster for his own advantage, but a law reformer, laboring for the common welfare. It honored in him the statesmanlike lawgiver, who drew within the compass of his conception and investigations all questions of public interest, devoting to it an inexhaustible productive power and an almost painful conscientiousness and zeal which knew of no rest. Thus the stamp of his mind became perceptibly imprinted on the wide range of laws made in his time, whether constitutional or municipal, whether referring to the penal code or provincial enactments, educational or military questions, home or foreign politics. It honored in him the patriot, whose every thought and action was inspired by the warmest love of country, who watched over the welfare of his people with an almost motherly devotion, who boldly dismasked the growing corruption, and who, at the call of duty, disdained the favor of the mighty, defying their displeasure; but who also, if the public interest seemed to demand it of him, was capable to hold out the hand of reconciliation, even after the most bitter controversy, to assist in that which he had proved to be good, and ready to render to his opponent the tribute of his gratitude for his merits in the service of the fatherland.

And, lastly, it honored in him the man whose strict integrity even the tongue of calumny did not dare to assail, who despised riches and pomp in his ceaseless labors to be useful, whose noble soul revolted against every wrong, whose tender heart felt the cares and wants of others as were they his own, and whose spotless life was a pattern to all.

This was Lasker, whom the German people honored in his life and at whose death they mourn.

A few months ago he came to us, tired and sick, to seek in this country a restoration of vigor, rest, health, new hope, and desire for work. Oftimes it seemed as if his quest would be rewarded. His friends were pleased with his robust appearance, his reawakening humor, and the kind and thoughtful interest evinced in his narration of what he saw and experienced; and he had seen and learned so much here which gave him new joy in life and fresh courage.

The accomplished statesman, the patriot, and military hero of two continents, Carl Schurz, paid the following tribute to the memory of Lasker:

The name of the man at whose dead body we stand awakens the memory of great struggles. But at this bier the voice of party is silent. Honor owes and honor gives the German to the mightiest of all the statesmen of our time, whose far sight, prodigious power, and bold courage rescued the old fatherland of its desolate disruption and humiliating impotence. All honor to the wise warriors and to the heroic people in arms who swept the field for the union of the great German nation and the resurrection of the empire in new power and glory. And no less honor is due to the men who, with patriotic spirit and zealous conviction, endeavored to finish this mighty building not only as a strong bulwark against the outer enemy, but also as a safe and homelike dwelling for a free people. And when the German recalls this list of honor the name of Eduard Lasker will rank among the very first.

The independence of a nation, the existence of an empire, and its outward power, safety, and honor are maintained and guarded by diplomatic prudence and by the sword. But the welfare of a people and its inner moral greatness can only prosper through the rule of right embodied in the law. History perhaps records more brilliantly the fame of the conqueror who, after sanguinary struggles, plants his victorious banners on the field of battle, who destroys hostile armies, and subjugates peoples; but his real merit is only measured by the aim for whose realization he fights. More calmly and modestly labors the man who fathoms with conscientious research the moral and social condition of his people, apprehends their wants, exposes the imperfections of the commonwealth, devises means to better this condition, to heal these infirmities, to restrain power within its proper limits, to help the weak to his right, and to secure individual liberty in the common order.

Thus manifests itself the wise legislator, the more quiet and more modest but in reality the greater benefactor of mankind. Upon such a field has the departed won his laurels, as the problem had to be solved to shape Germany's new era into enduring institutions and lawful order.

Well do I know that there are petty critics who say, what is al' this worth? Has he not been guilty of political errors? Did he not show himself in momentous situations weak and wavering? Be it so. He has committed errors and exhibited weakness. But of what consequence are these errors when we consider the great things he has accomplished? What are these weaknesses when compared with his virtues, which make him the peer of the first of his time?

Poor indeed would be the critic who would tear the sun from the firmament because its rays are too hot in the summer or not warm enough in the winter. Take the whole man as he was, and as he now stands in the history of his time, with all his thoughts and deeds, with his immense knowledge and noble aspirations, with his unselfish devotion and the extent of his work, how many are there who surpass him? Where is the nation which would not be proud to name him among their own?

It sounds like a libel upon human nature when the report reaches us from the other side that the fanatics of this new persecution of the Jews, this empty mockery of the boasted enlightenment and civilization of the nineteenth century, even now, after having darkened the last years of his life, are seeking to vilify him in the coffin because he was a Jew. Let us pity them, for they realize not their own shame and disgrace; in truth it may be said, "They know not what they do!" But all the more willing and proud are we to stand here, American and German citizens of a free country, not of his faith, and with us stands every honorable man who respects a man's true worth, and remembering the noble heart, the great mind and lofty ambition of the departed, we reach the hand of brotherhood to him even beyond the grave.

Let us see; and I beg the courtesy of the House while I attempt to explain in as brief a manner as possible the condition of parties in Germany and the relation of the distinguished dead thereto.

Absolute power pertains to every nation, the supreme and sovereign power which rules the entire body-politic. The residence of that sovereignty is the great question of the nineteenth century. In America, in England, and in France it unquestionably lies in the mass of the society, the community. In Germany it rests in the crown, not delegated, not held in trust, but inherently and absolutely, although since 1866 there has been a claim or show of constitutional government. All Germany has long been restless under this despotic form of government.

The liberal party of Germany is divided into three fractions: The progressist, the national liberal, and the secessionist. In 1866, after the Austro-Prussian war, which the government had carried on without any appropriation from Parliament, a conflict occurred between the representatives of the people and Bismarck. The old Parliament having been dissolved by the government, a new Parliament was elected more largely in opposition than was the previous one. Bismarck proposed a compromise, by acknowledging that the carrying on of the war without appropriation had been unconstitutional, and, provided that the present Parliament would give him indemnity for the money expended, he would then agree to a clause in the constitution which would make the expenditure of money permissible only after proper appropriation.

The progressist party refused indemnity. It was then that, mainly through the influence of Lasker, the national liberal party was formed upon the basis of the compromise offered by Bismarck. For eight years following this party, in healthy co-operation with Bismarck, established the now existing German constitution. In 1879, when Lasker found that the national liberal party were leaving the principles from which they took their name, and supporting Bismarck unconditionally, he seceded from it and was soon followed by its most prominent members, such as Baumberger, Richert, Forckenbeck, Stauffenbach, and others. This fraction of the liberal party is now called the secession party.

The conservative party consists of a great portion of the old nobility and Junkerdom, who accepted the German constitution very reluctantly, and are only too glad to support the reactionary measures of the prince chancellor, being warmest in their support when his actions ignore mostly the constitution that he helped to frame.

The ultramontane party is the catholic or church party, led by Windthorst. This party was formed at the time Bismarck inaugurated the noted Kulturkampf. There is no such thing as a government majority in the German Parliament, and the only way a majority can be obtained is by forming a combination of two or more of the parties mentioned.

Mr. Herbert Tuttle, in an interesting article on the representative composition of the Imperial Diet, said:

It represents all sections, all interests, all classes, all shades of political opinion; North German and South German; the Danes of Schleswig and the Poles of Posen are united in a single assembly. It contains Calvinists, Lutherans, Catholics, Jews, skeptics, and atheists. Printers and blacksmiths sit side by side with mediatized princes of the empire, priests by the side of judges, lawyers and professors with farmers and merchants. The division of parties is carried out with almost the minuteness of the scholastic logicians, so that the differences between some of them are hardly perceptible to the naked eye. Thus there may be found the German imperial party, or free conservatives, and then the conservatives proper, who are, however, no less free than their neighbors. The Catholics form a party called the center. But the Poles are also Catholics, yet they make a fraction by themselves; and so, too, are, for the most part, the deputies of Alsace-Lorraine, who have their own place in the parliamentary annual.

As to talent, finally, the Diet contains the best there is in Germany. The ineligible by law are few in number, and it must be said for the credit of the German constituencies that they have seldom been influenced by local claims, but have almost invariably preferred men of reputation and ability, wherever found, to obscure nobodies of their own neighborhood and district.

As soon as the determination of the chancellor to introduce protection became clearly known, and many liberals were hesitating between servile personal devotion to Bismarck and loyalty to their early economic convictions, Forckenbeck, though still president of the Diet, and burgomaster, not of Breslau, but of the capital, Berlin itself, came out openly and boldly in opposition, and made speeches which created an impassable gulf between him and the government. His fate was from that moment decided. Forckenbeck, and with him the liberals, must be punished at any cost. The cost was that of sacrifices to the ultramontanes, without whose aid the conservatives could not carry their candidates, and in the winter of 1878–'79 this coalition elevated Herr Von Seydewitz to the speakership.

This same writer goes on to say:

There are men in the German Reichstag whose forensic talents would adorn any legislative body in the world, and who presumably, if in office, would develop administrative talents not inferior to those of the forum who in England or France could command, and, if party conditions were favorable, would receive portfolios in the ministry, but who under the German system may spend their lives in unprofitable debate, without ever being invited to share the work of construction and execution. Such a man is, for instance, Professor Gneist. Known abroad, and well known as an accomplished jurist and constitutional scholar, he has in Germany the additional reputation of an experienced legislator, who has left his imprint on nearly every great organic measure of the past decade as an effective debater, who is always heard with the profoundest respect, and as a politician who only wants the opportunity to show the qualities of the statesman.

Speaking of Lasker, he says:

He is a product of the "Conflikts-Zeit," but from 1866 to 1878 he ranked as a tolerably regular, though candid and discriminating, supporter of Bismarck's policy. The constitutional legislation of 1867 and again of 1871 enjoyed the advantage of his intelligent and forcible advocacy. * * * The great process of judicial reform and consolidation received from him a support which Bismarck hardly distinguished from open hostility, but which was indispensable to its triumph. Even the repressive measures against socialism, though deplored, were practically accepted by Lasker.

But the chancellor is satisfied in the end with nothing short of absolute and unhesitating obedience. The breach between him and Lasker, threatened for several years, finally came in 1878, and, as in the case of Forckenbeck, it was caused by the fiscal innovations. A brief explanation of this fatal controversy is essential to a correct understanding of the actual relations of parties in the Diet.

The traditional policy of the empire, or rather of the Zollverein, which antedates the empire, was that of free trade. It had, indeed, always had its enemies. Some were such from conviction, others from interest; but they were few in number, and without influence. The government, with Bismarck at its head, paid no attention to the dreary harangues which men like Kardorff and Varnbüler annually delivered on their favorite grievance, and up to 1878 showed no disposition to suffer, much less to propose, any change. But in 1878 the chancellor began to waver, and after various preparatory hints and signs, actually issued a protectionist manifesto, which at once revolutionized the whole aspect of affairs. Commercial reasons, fiscal reasons, political reasons, were all used to justify the abandonment of free trade. German industry was languishing, and needed the stimulus of favorable legislation; the imperial treasury was not sufficiently independent, and ought to have revenues of its own adequate to its wants; the old system was the chief prop of state-rights, and its modification would be a great step toward unity and strength. These arguments were all specious, and some of them, from one point of view, not unsound; and where the argument failed, the prince threw his own personality into the scale, and eventually carried his point. Parties were variously distributed in regard to the subject, but the distribution was no obstacle to Bismarck's plans. The conservatives were on the whole inclined to protection for its own sake, and ready to accept it blindly for the sake of its new champion. The radicals were opposed both to the person and the project of the chancellor. The ultramontanes, as above said, were open to what the French call a "transaction." And as for the national liberals, they were keenly anxious to avoid a rupture with the great minister, whom they had supported for over a decade, but they were also committed, as a party and as individuals, to the cause of free trade. The result was easy to predict. A schism in the party was produced, some of them throwing aside their convictions out of subservience to Bismarck, and the others obeying their consciences, and going into reluctant opposition. The conservatives, the ultramontanes, and a few of the national liberals formed a majority, and the work was done. Protection was introduced, Forckenbeck was expelled from the speakership, and the national liberal party went to pieces.

This explains why Lasker is now found in the opposition, and with him some of the best talent of the party, among them the gifted Bamberger.

With this explanation I shall quote from adherents of one or the other of these parties to show Lasker's political standing in Germany; and I think I shall succeed in proving that by none of the parties was he looked upon or treated as either a strict opponent to the existing government, or, much less, an ordinary agitator, but that all agree, no matter how much they might have occasion to differ with him politically, as to his patriotism and true efforts to act only for the good of the fatherland.

We find attending his funeral not, as seems to be the general impression here, simply adherents of his own immediate party friends, but, on the contrary, conservatives, ultramontanes, the liberal party in all its shades, all the dignitaries of the city of Berlin, representatives of the press, professors of the universities—in fact, all phases of German life and German politics except those directly under the control of the chancellor. We find there the president of the Reichstag, who is an ultra conservative; we find the vice-president of the same body, also a conservative; nearly all the chief officers of the Prussian Diet and the president of the imperial chamber. In fact, most of such as hold any public positions in either the German or Prussian Parliament assembled with the political friends of the deceased statesman to render the last honors to his memory.

No wonder, then, that the absence of all such officials as depend upon the will of the government only appears the more glaring. I shall attempt to show from quotations, from writers and speakers of all political sides, as to the difference of feeling about Lasker in Germany before and after the funeral.

Heinrich Richert, member of the Reichstag, says:

Friends and opponents know what services he has rendered in the most important departments of our legislation; they know that his wonderful, inexhaustible working power, his quick and keenly penetrating perception, and his earnest mind were, especially during the great reformatory epoch since the wars of 1866 and 1870, the most reliable support of all efforts in behalf of national success and liberal institutions. He frequently characterized as the happiest epoch in his life, notwithstanding the labor they cost him, those significant years when the government and the people's representatives labored harmoniously in retrieving the neglect of decenniums.

Does this sound like the comment of one agitator about another? I shall continue to read from the same source and leave you to judge whether the remarks are of a partisan nature:

Whenever the idea of the national state had to be upheld in contrast to narrow-minded particularism, whenever it was necessary to assist the demands of the public weal against selfish acts and to cleanse public life of low practices, then was he ever found in the front of the fray. At this time his influence in Parliament, inconvenient as it may have been to many, was undisputed. During those laborious years Lasker indulged in but very little leisure and recreation, not for the want of their proper appreciation, nor because he would not have understood how to use time taken from political work in a more pleasant manner. Few understood how to enjoy the wonders of nature and art with so much thorough exaltation as he. His sense for the beautiful, his great respect for earnest research, caused him to seek especially the society of men of science and of art. Nor did he despise true sociability, and he knew how to enliven conversation by good humor and ready wit, until he, usually before any of the others, retired to return to his labors. To him the doctrines of love of mankind and equal rights for all were no mere theories; he substantiated them by his deeds in his mode of living and intercourse. He was not only a reliable friend to his political associates, but held also most pleasant personal relations with political opponents. * * * During the conflicts of 1878 and the following years Lasker stood in the front rank, notwithstanding his failing health.

In the positive creations also he took, as far as his convictions would permit, a most active part, in spite of unfavorable circumstances. Only last year he accepted a place in the commission for the sick-fund law, despite the remonstrances of his friends, and labored in it for months, besides performing his duties in the sessions of the house. Lasker's eminent services in this commission during the deliberations of the Reichstag met with recognition from all sides of the house. It was the last of his parliamentary labors. It had so completely exhausted him and he showed such evidences of an overstrain of his faculties that even he became convinced of the necessity of indulging for some time in quiet retirement.

You see the spirit of all that is said here is in praise of one who was assumed to be beyond dispute a patriot and a lover of his country under the institutions then existing. Albert Hanel, progressist, with whom Lasker had had many a political tilt, says of him:

We most deeply mourn for the man—not because it is the custom to let partyism be silent at the open grave, but because the importance of his life demands it. He grew out of narrow circumstances, he lacked the backing which rank and fortune afford; he was not favored by reason of physical advantages nor through insinuating mental endowments; he has never sought nor found the favors of the governing powers. Through never-tiring energy, incessant industry, through a character trained to morality, and relying only upon his own powers and his own courage, he succeeded in securing for himself a foremost place in the Parliament of Germany, in directing party life in a decisive manner, and in exerting an important influence on the government and the course and character of legislation. That is merit, independent of the estimate to be placed on the results of each of his actions. For it is a blessing to every people to find animating examples of what the will and effort of one man may accomplish, to be possessed of conciliating evidences that the distinctions in the outer conditions of life are not insurmountable. Among the self-made men of Germany Lasker will always be named first, and with reverence.

Rudolph Gneist, a national liberal of Bismarck proclivities, and one of the acknowledged leaders of the Reichstag, says:

Ever filled with warmest love for fatherland, ever spurred to strive for the highest moral ideal of the state, ever honestly working for the realization of his ideal on the basis of existing conditions, Eduard Lasker will not only live in the memory of his friends—his name will ever be mentioned among the most honorable and most unselfish, who, during a happy epoch, labored most productively. I know that I may pronounce this grateful acknowledgment in behalf of all my political friends.

Is such tribute usually paid to a partisan or an agitator by one opposed to him politically during life?

Hear Ludwig Baumbach, one of Germany's greatest men:

It was a horror to our friends to see the German Reichstag desecrated by haggling and chafing over import duties on grain and iron. Many a one, proud of his Christianity, could have learned much from this Jew, especially that humanity which is the true foundation of Christianity.

I remember that Dr. Windthorst, who always cherished kindly feelings for Lasker, although his opponent, said to me once, "Lasker has for years done fully one-half of the parliamentary work."

Lasker was a thorough national man. He himself has told me that in his earliest youth, when among the poor, maltreated Jews in the province of Posen, where he grew up, they were imbued with the highest respect for the Prussian monarchy and Hohenzollerns, and how that respect had been indelibly impressed upon his mind.

Speaking of the influence which the enactment of the criminal code (which was mainly Lasker's work) might have on the liberal party, Baumbach says:

At that time the life of the party seemed to be in danger, and then it was that Lasker said to me: "A party is a self-purpose; even if the national liberal party is wrecked, the German nation has its criminal law."

Our deceased friend had, during that time, been frequently reproached with having indorsed Prince Bismarck's policy altogether too readily, while others criticised the severity with which he not unfrequently opposed the chancellor. He himself said once in the Reichstag, after all intercourse between them had ceased:

"I can say for myself, and the country knows it to be true, that I have supported the chancellor through many years in a spirit that has not been excelled by any one in this house, whether with as much ability or not is a matter of opinion. I was not his opponent when he followed the policy which he repudiates to-day. I am naturally his opponent since he walked in the opposite direction. Of course, I have always rendered my assistance with the perfect independence of my own opinion. If that alone suffices to make me his opponent, then certainly I have been his adversary of old."

As is well known, the chancellor answered thereto that he was forced to destroy his illusions with rough hands.

"The representative," said Prince Bismarck, "is perhaps so organized in mind that he considers as a kindness what the recipient considers—I will not say a grievance, but as an act of opposition. I have felt his efforts from the beginning to be, though not in principle, yet in fact, opposed to me and my plans. Before some amendments of Lasker were agreed to I had little hope of support, and these amendments frequently crossed my tendencies severely. I feel that I owe no thanks for any support rendered me by him."

In Lasker's celebrated speech against the excesses in the matter of charging railroad companies, he said:

During my whole life I have taken pains that every step of mine in pecuniary matters can bear public scrutiny; that I refused everything which was not only in direct contradiction but even in competition with my public acts.

Only a man so irreproachable as Lasker could attack the most influential and prominent men at the time when stock swindling flourished most, as he did in his speech of February 7, 1873. Wherever Lasker found wrongdoing, his character ceased to be mild. Said he in his memorable speech—

I have received letters threatening to publish names which belong to my political friends, which would make the scandal as far-reaching as possible; if one, all should fall. Gentlemen, I have derided those threats. Whoever has a clear conscience need not care for such things, and, God forbid it! if men who do not deserve to be here have sneaked into the ranks of honest men, then cast them out! Good society discards them; they are forgotten, and the moral sense of the people stands unimpaired. But as long as such men remain in honorable society as secret poison, they will corrupt; therefore, out with them.

And yet the close of this life filled with conflicts and difficulties was rounded off beautifully. Joyfully was he affected by the homage paid him on the other side of the ocean.

Baumbach continues:

"I find," wrote the dear friend to me but a few weeks ago, "what I have sought—grand, encouraging, and refreshing impressions. I count the voyage to America among the happiest performances of my life. It is exceedingly interesting to observe how in the life of the far East, the whole West, as well as the South of that great country, the same views prevail, and how identically the affairs of state are being performed in the widely different portions of the great continent. Public opinion and national pride are so universal, that we can only wish Germany may have an equally powerful national feeling and a like pride of union and an equal unity of interest."

And this from a member of his own party. Does he boast of his colleague as one who had attempted to destroy the institutions of his government, or one who had succeeded in his opposition to the existing government? Or does he speak of him as one who, whether co-operating with or opposing the chancellor, was guided only by one idea, the welfare of the state? Does he not tell you, in Lasker's own words, that party was considered by him but the means, the good of the whole country the object, in all his political efforts? In quoting to you what was said by Baumberger (unquestionably the first German orator of our day) after the funeral, I wish you to pay close attention to the effect that this jealous abstinence of all government officials from the funeral of this man, whose memory was universally acknowledged to be dear to the whole country, naturally had upon the minds of the German people.

Says Baumberger:

Such a panorama has passed before us this morning, a picture grander in merit than anything my words can describe—the picture of a great community, a great political association, an escort representing the noblest elements of the whole of Germany, who followed the cortege devoutly and collected piously around the catafalque, plainly, without ostentation, as was befitting the man, and especially without that official pomp to which he ever remained a stranger, and which we have not missed to-day. Although it did not follow his coffin, it was no part of him who was a whole citizen, a self-reliant man, wholly a legislator, who needed no other support but that of the rights which he represented. May I be capable of portraying a man who understood how to bind so many hearts to himself!

Wherever grand results for the common good have been achieved in Germany during nearly two decenniums, there the name of Lasker shone in the front rank, there his co-operation was always invited. That inspiration which led the people to grand achievements was partly his work, and that harvest of grand deeds which took substantial form in German national life bears, more than that of any other, the marks of the master-hand of this great political artist, who was our dear friend. He it was who labored more incessantly, more diversely, than any of his associates in the very front of political activity.

Death is a great master; in destroying mortal life he also elevates it above the oppressiveness of temporal barriers in which it moves. He portrays it as a whole before the vision of the survivor in one moment. And this master-work death performed when the message came from beyond the ocean, Lasker is dead! In the same moment broke the cloud that had obscured the name of Lasker to some classes of the people. And as the wailing call and the exclamation of admiration from across the seas was heard, so pervaded the wails of sympathy, of gratitude, of mourning for Lasker throughout the German Empire, from north to south, from east to west. And well may we say this moment that death alone has re-established that justice which for a time seemed to be denied to him.

Men who honor Germany without distinction of party, who love Germany, who are filled with the kindest wishes for Germany, and know it well from personal observation—men like Carl Schurz and Andrew White, the latter, who as minister of the United States lived in Berlin for years, and as a scholar as well as a statesman learned to appreciate Germany—such men have borne witness of Lasker's universal fame; and the Congress of American Representatives—to whom, as I believe, Germany's liberal-minded men may express their grateful thanks in my voice—that Congress has shown us by the honorable vote for the memory of our friend how not only the world separated by space, but also that separated by time—posterity—will judge him.

And how could it be otherwise? How could we, when we contemplate the works of the man—I mean his influence on his fellow-citizens—how could we explain them except by the fact that also he understood to speak and act from the innermost and best part of the nation. Oh, he was not armed with the wiles of the misleader of the people. Nobody could have been less a demagogue; no one was less affected by the wild element that carries away the passions of an easily moved populace by the delusions of oratory. What he did have, what won him hearts, what made his word to be more important than that of thousands, was the fact that he spoke from out of the inwardness of a whole people. This made him powerful, and there is no other real power of speech but this. An orator may please, but he who for more than a decennium forms the thoughts, resolutions, and views of his fellow-citizens does only succeed by being one of them, by having read the innermost recesses of their souls, and, knowing, to clothe in words the uninterpreted thoughts floating through their minds. That was his art, his secret. Not he, the German nation, has for more than ten years spoken through his mouth.

And now I ask what was the true work of this battler, this man who made himself so prominent in the state and among the people? I would not like to say that he was really what is called a man of liberty, nor that the phrase "the man of the people" covers and exhausts the meaning. Certainly a good and liberal portion of both was in him, but were I asked to picture in a single word the man, the flame that burned most strongly within him, and was the spiritus rector of all his thoughts and deeds, then would I say "He was a man of right—right and justice!" Right and justice was the god that dwelt within his soul; that explains all his thoughts and works. I myself found during the last days, among the notes I searched to again familiarize myself with his fruitful course of life, the first traces of his appearance in public, and I found them in an act vindicating right and justice.

A liberal candidate for Parliament was to be nominated for a Berlin district in the beginning of the year 1865. A state's attorney named Schwarck had been proposed. There arose in the meeting an unknown, insignificant-looking man and opposed his nomination. He called attention to the singular rôle played by the candidate in the Stieber trial. He challenged him before the meeting. He cross-examined him with all the acuteness and agility of his legal ability, and the result was that not more than three or four votes were cast for this candidate, who had come strongly before the meeting. It was a first act in expiation of public justice that ushered our friend into public life, and to this calling he remained true to the end. * * * Altogether he was perhaps of all others whom the newest time had estranged from the powerful statesman who shapes the destinies of Germany the man who most sympathized with certain leading features of his newest policy. It was he who had assisted him, enabling him to carry out his internal policy. Without Lasker the acquisition of the railways by the state would not have been accomplished. It was his influence which had prepared his party in the house of representatives for the acquisition of the railroads by the state; and as we know ingratitude to be the reward in public life, especially when one is associated with the great of the world, so he has never received thanks for his great assistance.

When, perhaps by reason of a miraculous accident, we have not seen a single representative of the power of the state at the bier of Lasker, if it was not mere accident but perhaps a providential occurrence, then it must have been because this providence reasoned: The spirit of Lasker is so dangerous to me that even in his death I dare not honor him by apparently approaching him. Really, my friends, I will not say no more beautiful, but certainly no more grateful or characteristic, homage to the power of Lasker's mind could have been rendered than by that absence which shone among us as we buried him; for it shows us what we possessed in him. It proves to us that it is found necessary to further combat the ideas, the aims, the mind, that lived within him, because the dead Lasker lives on still and leads us further as a living man. He was the man of the people, who asks nothing of the official state, no recognition, no homage. And if he was such, he was it by reason of deeds incomparable in greatness and in numbers.

Nor was he a Utopian, except perhaps, in one respect—his works of charity. One frequently hears of some one living in great luxury; where does he take the means for such extravagance? That could of course not apply to Lasker, but I, who have had an insight into his circumstances, have sometimes asked where does he take the means for all his charities?

So has he risen by work, and finally just by rendering the Government of the German Empire a valuable service (for which alone it should have been grateful to him). He worked himself sick on that law which has emanated from the sick-fund bill. His alone is the merit, if it be one, of having made it. It was introduced mixed up with the accident-insurance law, which is destined to occupy us in the future. On one of those days I promenaded with Lasker, and I casually remarked, without attaching any importance to it, and perhaps I am yet sorry for it to this day, in the course of conversation: "Some part of this law might possibly be saved if the sick-fund was pared off." He immediately took up this thought, went home and worked it out, and the passage of the law was only due to his gigantic efforts in the committee. The last speech which he made to us (his mind was still fresh and clear—crippled were only his wings) was made in behalf of this law. With it expired the remnant of his power.

Yes, honored audience, when I recall those times, when I remember how, when a law was in course of preparation, ministers and counselors of state listened eagerly to Lasker's words—how well then they knew that the fate of the law depended upon his decision, and that minister of state remarked to his secretary: "Lasker has spoken approvingly, I am now well safe," and I could recite more such remarks. I have witnessed that a high official of state, who today also has demonstrated the independence of his opinion by his absence, said upon his promotion into a higher office to Lasker, "I hope that you will render me the same assistance in my new office as you have done in my former." They went to him, mounting the three flights of stairs. He never went to one of them to ask anything.

Much that has been said since this resolution was adopted has not found favor in the eyes of the one man who, not satisfied with autocratically dictating to his own people, not satisfied to reduce the ministers of his state to the position of mere clerks, not satisfied with attempting to degrade the Parliament of his own country, undertakes to seize what appears to him an acceptable opportunity to disgrace a foreign minister before his own Government because, forsooth, he acts with a view only of executing with dignity and spirit the duties he owes that Government. He also undertakes to cast contempt upon the Congress of another most friendly nation because it did not foresee that its expressions of sympathy for one they knew was considered a patriot in his own country and a supporter of universal brotherhood throughout the world would arouse his displeasure.

The theory which Prince Bismarck has attempted to ascribe to this mere act of courtesy, this simple display of good-will, that the passing of this resolution aimed at interference of one country with the political affairs of another, has found favor with a few, but thank God only a few, people in this country. That Lasker was not, by his labors nor by any quality that we know of concerning him, entitled to such respect, has also (like every other theory that is advanced when a dispute arises about any important matter) some supporters. I think that without any comment of mine, even those who have had the least opportunity to know the man for all his worth will feel convinced after the quotations from the leaders of German opinion and from the German press that the one theory has as little foundation as the other.

We find all of the expressions about Lasker after his death, whether they come from one party or another, agreeing alike in the fact that he was a man foremost among the patriots of his country; that he was a philanthropist; that justice was the main composition of his nature. And we find further that his people consider him as part of their history, and, as Baumberger says, of their best history. Is it presumption on the part of a friendly nation, then, to express their feelings of condolence to a representative man of another friendly nation upon the tragic end of such representative, when this end takes place upon the shores of the nation expressing this condolence? Or is such a man as we find Lasker to be, from all sources of information which are accessible to us, to be considered of too little importance for such expressions of sympathy? If, for argument sake, we have made a mistake in the importance of the man, where is the injury to the prince chancellor or his government or the German people in these expressions of sympathy? Is it usual among either individuals or nations, when supposed to hold friendly relations with each other, to seek unfriendly motives in friendly expressions? I should think not. Nay, gentlemen, this is, as I started out to show, an intentional effort on the part of the German chancellor to make good his own mistake by putting those into a ridiculous attitude who attempted to honor Lasker's memory. In his efforts so to do he forgets every consideration due the American people and casts this insult at them, depending on his undisputed skill of diplomacy to pacify us if we should take any exception to his action.

Mr. Speaker, we now learn for the first time that no opinion can be allowed to go to the Reichstag unless, in the reported language of the chancellor of the empire, it be his "own." If Prince Bismarck is correctly reported, then, sir, so far as Germany is concerned, he and not this House is the judge of the extent of the bereavement occasioned by the death of Herr Lasker. In Prince Bismarck's opinion he himself is the government and Herr Lasker was his enemy. If this is the correct view of the case, if the people of Germany have no existence to the outside world except as an appanage of the chancellor, then I admit that a mistake was made in tendering our sympathy to a personage who so little appreciated our good-will. We might now, without lowering our dignity, retract the resolution had not it been so brusquely returned to us. It is a custom as old as civilization for friendly nations as well as men to express toward each other sympathy on occasions of great bereavements. Such expressions are customary on the death of great men. Following this gentle custom, we tendered to Germany, not to Prince Bismarck, our condolences on the death of Lasker.

In face of that brusqueness we can not retract the tender of our sympathy with Germany, and we can not condescend to explain to the rude chancellor that no offense was intended toward himself or the emperor or reflection intended on his or their policy of government.

In the light of international precedent no fair construction of the resolution would show any such intention on our part.

So long as friendly relations are maintained between nations it should require very clear and unmistakable language of the one to the other to justify a construction showing hostile reflection on the policy of either government in respect to its internal affairs.

When in this House a few years ago the representatives of the American people in Congress assembled adjourned to receive and hear an address from Mr. Charles Stuart Parnell, who was then, as he still is, the brilliant leader of a small but most able body of representatives in the British Parliament, the Irish national party, do you suppose for a moment, sir, that in extending that courtesy a partisan attitude was taken by the House in respect to the land-league policy of Mr. Parnell or that any reflection on Mr. Gladstone's policy was intended?

If at that time Mr. Parnell had died here—long may he live!—think you, sir, that a resolution similar to that passed on the death of Lasker would have been any more objectionable to Mr. Gladstone than the reception extended to his parliamentary opponent, or that the great prime minister of England would have considered himself degraded to the position of a "postman" for his enemies, had our minister asked him to forward the resolution to the House of Parliament? The great Irish patriot and agitator O'Connell has often been eulogized in this House.

I do not remember whether any resolutions were passed by either House of Congress on the occasion of his death; but if there were, I am sure they must have been laudatory of his patriotic life and work and inoffensive toward the British Government. Death strikes down all partisan feeling. The noble aspirations of the departed soul, even when uncongenial with our own, are remembered with admiration.

When we passed the resolution of sympathy with the people of Germany we were under the reasonable impression that their Parliament was a free body. We knew that, like all representative legislatures or councils, it contained delegates of opposite parties. But if such parties presented themselves to our minds we would have ignored their divisions, under the assumption that each was devoted to the advancement of the best interests of the German people according to its best judgment.

It is not to be admitted, and no action ought now be taken that would afford grounds for the supposition, that this popular branch of the American Congress so far forgot what was due to international courtesy as to assume a partisan attitude in respect to any element of the German Parliament.

In assuming that we took such an attitude Prince Bismarck jumped at a most erroneous conclusion. He made a serious mistake in refusing passage to our resolution, and was guilty of a gross rudeness in returning it to our Government without being certain as to our intentions in passing it.

If the rudeness was with the intent to offer insult—let us have even but the smallest grounds for such a belief, and it would be our duty to demand an apology for the insult. The people of the United States will hold us to a strict accountability in this matter. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House is either unnecessary or worse. I would have something more vigorous or else silence. Our first resolution was simply eulogistic and sympathetic; it requires neither retraction, explanation, nor apology. It was a customary act among nations, and no better occasion or more worthy ever arose in our national existence than that which inspired it.

Mr. Speaker, this question goes deeper than appears on the surface. Nothing impressed me more thoroughly during a late visit abroad than the undoubted and unquestionable progress of liberal opinions and free institutions on the continent, and the persistent resistance thereto by certain surviving royal families, of whom the German chancellor is the chief representative and spokesman. These people believe in the "divine right of kings." Even so kind and good a lady as Queen Victoria speaks with pride (in her recent memoirs) of having "Stuart blood" in her veins. When the Emperor William, himself one of the very best of men, spoke at the unveiling of the national monument, dedicated last summer to the soldiers of Germany, he said: "The Germans were led by their princes." At his coronation in Moscow last summer the present Czar of Russia, elated by the incense offered to him as a representative of Heaven, renewed the idea of the superiority in personal attributes of royalty, and in all orders and newspapers influenced by this despotic caste France is invariably spoken of as "isolated." Why? Because she has dared to become a republic. Because under free institutions she has dared to improve, and is day after day attesting the possibility of a great nation, under positive free government, of achieving unexceptionable prosperity, and that without the aid of any other "divine right or interposition" save that which comes from the great Ruler in the heavens above.

Apropos of this statement, I cite an instance where this audacious and autocratic prince deliberately brought about, by the use of one of his so-called expert diplomatic efforts, a bitter antagonism between two countries that were enjoying the warmest relations of friendship. Alphonso of Spain, a young, gallant man, intending a visit of acquiescence in and admiration for the Republic of France, wherein he had received sanctuary during the expulsion of himself and family from his own country and where he was awaited by that kind-hearted and generous people with enthusiasm, was made the cat's-paw for an unprovoked insult to that nation. The purpose of the wily chancellor was to alienate public sentiment from them by inciting them to incivility to a guest of their nation, and to show further that a republic was a spiritless government, which could not resent an affront to its dignity.

The very same purpose actuates Bismarck in the return of these resolutions to this Government.

Liberal ideas are growing too strong in Germany. The Republic of the United States is a constant argument in favor of those ideas. The chancellor proposes to show his people that he can treat our Republic with supreme contempt!

We are strong enough, some say, not to care. Yes; but have we a right to set back the growing hope of mankind, who look to us as the examplar of successful free government?

Prince Bismarck has undertaken to say that he will not give these resolutions to the emperor or to the representative body of the empire to which they were addressed. Why? Because they commend freedom, and he believes in absolutism. By what right then does he, an inferior by his own argument, suppress and return them? We can receive a reply only from the head of the state, and in a republic we can not recognize the right of any one citizen to arrogate to himself the authority of the people. He is not the chief executive of Germany; he is not the Reichstag!

These resolutions were a national communication, and ought to have an answer from a nation—not a single individual of that nation. If, then, Prince Bismarck, by his own argument, be but a lackey of an absolute throne, we should demand that the resolution be forwarded by him to that throne. If there be indeed a people and a government in Germany, the Republic of the United States should insist that a communication from the Government of the United States, addressed to the Government of Germany, shall be delivered to that government.

I will read an eminent authority on the duties and prerogatives of ministers of state. Vattel, in his Law of Nations, says:

When a nation chooses a conductor it is not with a view that he should deliver up his charge into other hands. Ministers ought only to be instruments in the hands of the prince; he ought constantly to direct them, and continually endeavor to know whether they act according to his intentions. If the imbecility of age or any infirmity render him incapable of governing, a regent ought to be nominated, according to the laws of the state; but when once the sovereign is capable of holding the reins let him insist on being served, but never suffer himself to be superseded.

Mr. Speaker, one little incident of a not uneventful life I treasure above all others. Over one hundred years after the establishment of this Government I had the pleasure of accompanying the minister of the United States to the French Republic on a journey to the inauguration of a statue erected to one whose youthful mind had been inspired and wrought up to enthusiasm by that heroic struggle of our forefathers against tyranny and oppression. That man was La Fayette. Another hundred years would have elapsed, in my humble belief, before this tribute had been rendered him from the nation in which he was born and to whose greatness and honor he had contributed the best years of his life, had France been under the control of a monarchical or imperial government.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, ere I die that I will have the proud privilege and pleasure of going with another American minister upon a similar mission; and near to that grand statue lately erected upon the banks of the noble Rhine, which represents the grandeur of the United German Confederation, I hope to see one rearing its proud front to heaven, with no insignia of crown or scepter, no gaudy semblance or reminder of bloody wars, but like the civic hero whose memory it will commemorate, plain, unostentatious, and grand in its chasteness and simplicity, with the legend inscribed upon its base, "Eduard Lasker, the friend of law and constitutional liberty."

ADDENDA.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 9, 1884.]

Mr. OCHILTREE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret of the death of the eminent German statesman Eduard Lasker.

"That his loss is not alone to be mourned by the people of his native land, where his firm and constant exposition of and devotion to free and liberal ideas have materially advanced the social, political, and economic condition of those peoples, but by the lovers of liberty throughout the world.

"That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the family of the deceased as well as to the minister of the United States resident at the capital of the German Empire, to be by him communicated through the legitimate channel to the presiding officer of the legislative body of which he was a member."

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

[From the Berliner Boersen Courier (Progressist), January 7, 1884.]

During two decenniums stood the man who has now closed his eyes for the everlasting sleep in the very midst of the political life of our fatherland, which during that period has undergone the most far-reaching, most powerful changes; his whole soul, all his aims, belonged to the political development of Prussia and Germany. He devoted all his strength and power to it, and he did it with such entirety, such devotion, and unselfishness as none other beside him.

Whatever attacks may have been made upon him during party strife, the tireless zeal, the personal disinterestedness of the man compelled recognition even from his enemies, and not the slightest stain has ever rested upon this pure character. His personal affairs prove his whole life and all his endeavors were devoted to the public interests only. Lasker remained unmarried; his time, his inclinations, his whole soul belonged to public life, to his political efforts.

[From the Neue Preussische Zeitung (Conservative, Orthodox Protestant), January 8, 1884.]

To judge, without injustice on the one and without sentimentality on the other hand, a political opponent is no easy task. It will satisfy an impartial observer to say of Representative Lasker that he was a man of uncommon genius, who was also imbued with an idealism that ever aims at the best. Objective praise would not sound well from us, because it could not be pronounced without disowning our own aims and acts.

In most everything was the deceased one of our most honest, but also in principle one of our most radical, opponents. The result of this fact can not be changed even at the open grave; it must remain as it was in life; but whatever of bitterness might have attached thereto must now disappear. Grudges would be out of place even toward an enemy of less honorable ways of thinking. But of this departed one we take leave with the simple words: "May he rest in peace!"

[From the Berlin Post (Conservative) January 8, 1884.]

In parliamentary meetings he excelled through very extraordinary oratorical talents and remarkably steady industry. Since the founding of the national liberal party, as one of its leaders and most important orators he was borne on a growing flood of popularity that reached its highest mark February 7, 1873, when he made his celebrated speech against stock-swindling, which had risen highest during the latter part of 1872, and while the menacing specter of the approaching catastrophe was towering in plain view of all sensible people.

[From the Berlinische Zeitung (royal privileged), January 7, 1884.]

Lasker's importance in the entire history of our modern political development can not be exhausted within the narrow frame of a plain obituary. Like those singular natures who, as products of strict self-training, so frequently attain uncommon importance in that land where he breathed his last, so was he in the true sense of the word a self-made man.

[During the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. OCHILTREE] has expired.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended.

Mr. BELFORD and Mr. WELLER asked consent for an extension of time.

Objection was made.

Mr. OCHILTREE. Then I ask leave to print the remainder of my remarks.

Objection was made, but afterward withdrawn.

Mr. WASHBURN. I would like to inquire what time was assigned to the gentleman from Texas?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN. Under what rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the twenty-eighth rule.

Mr. WASHBURN. I would like to hear that rule read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read clause 3 of Rule XXVIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded, it shall be in order, before the final vote is taken thereon, to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to, such proposition, and the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the answer of the Chair to the question of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN].

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. It is whether it is in order for this House at this time, through one of its members, to present a resolution apologizing to the iron tyranny of the chancellor of the German Empire?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say that it was not in order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. CURTIN. I do not design to speak to the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I will yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER], my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Speaker, I for one regret the hasty action of the German chancellor in refusing to transmit the resolution of condolence of this House at the death of Dr. Lasker, merely, as it appears, on account of his antipathy against a departed political adversary. He knows, as does every person, that to place before the Reichstag the resolution of the American House of Representatives did not in any wise imply that he indorsed the sentiments therein expressed. His office, so far as the resolution is concerned, was that of the medium rather than that of the master, and his assumption of the latter rôle was in my opinion unfortunate only for himself.

We can afford to cover this act with the charity of forgetfulness; to err is human, to forgive divine. We may say with Pericles:

We are liberal in our public administration; and with regard to the mutual jealousy of our daily pursuits we are not angry with our neighbor if he does anything to please himself, nor wear on our countenance offensive looks, which, though harmless, are unpleasant.

The Parliament and the people of Germany are in possession of the letter and spirit of the resolutions, even though the parchment upon which they were indited be doomed to molder in the chancellor's waste-basket. The action of our State Department can not be too highly commended. It was not only dignified, but it did not overstep the bounds of international courtesy, while at the same time administering a rebuke to what it justly considered an unwarranted usurpation of the rights and privileges of the German Parliament and people.

Mr. Speaker, I was, I may say it with some degree of pride, intimately acquainted with him whose death has given rise to this controversy. I was among the last persons with whom he conversed before his death, and in justice to his memory I deem it my duty to say that I have Dr. Lasker's own words for it that he had the highest regard for the German chancellor, both as a man and a statesman. They both differed mainly only on one question, a question, sir, upon which not only the two political parties upon this floor differ, but upon which the members of each are not united. Dr. Lasker was a free-trader. This much hath his offending; no more. People uninitiated into German politics have stigmatized him with nihilism, socialism, and all other "isms" in the vocabulary, simply because, as a liberal, he believed in opening the marts of Germany to the competition of the world.

It is not my purpose, nor is this the place, to eulogize the deceased German statesman, but in my heart I mourn his loss as a man of broad views, grand inspirations, and a noble heart. As an American citizen he would have achieved distinction as an advocate and guardian of institutions broad enough for his broad mind; as a German he claimed the right to expand beyond the boundaries of arbitrary power. The result is seen to-day in the vindication of the one and rebuke of the other.

Mr. CURTIN. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS], a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, this may have been a small matter. Circumstances have made it an important matter. The committee, after much trouble, has made a unanimous report. It ought to have an explanation. That is my excuse for the few remarks that I shall make.

I remember that it was at the close of a long day when the gentleman from Texas sent his resolutions to the desk and asked unanimous consent for their adoption. We were closing our desks preparatory to adjournment, and paused only to hear the object of the motion. It was regret for the death of Lasker. He had just died in this country, suddenly, and only a few days after he had received an informal but cordial welcome on the floor of this House. We felt the regret, saw no need to supervise the manner in which such a sentiment was expressed, gave our consent to the resolutions, and adjourned. They took the usual course. They went to our State Department; the State Department sent them to our minister; our minister delivered them at the office of foreign affairs in Berlin. In the mean time we had forgotten the incident.

Suddenly we learned by telegraph that the German chancellor had refused to accept them. This was startling and serious news. We hurried to the RECORD of January 10 to refresh our memories. We found that we had expressed regret for the death of an eminent German statesman and sympathy with the German Parliament of which he was a member. We had also expressed a belief that his devotion to free and liberal principles had materially advanced the interests of his people. Both statements were true, but in the first case the truth could be exported anywhere; in the other case the truth could not be exported and delivered to a friendly government who thought that his opinions had materially retarded the prosperity of his country. Evidently in our hasty action we had put ourselves in a dilemma. We wished to resent the rejection of friendly sentiments, but resentment was out of place when these sentiments were on the same sheet with political sentiments which no international code could approve.

What were we to do? There seemed no avenue of complete escape. There was an avenue which offered a temporary relief to our feelings. We could assume, not very logically but very naturally, that Bismarck, who had thrust himself into personal prominence in the transaction, did not represent his government or his people. We could separate him from them for our purposes and censure him for failing in his duty. We could call him an untrustworthy servant or postman, and could commiserate the German Government and the German people that they could not find a better. This was the wish at first of this House and of the country, that we should relieve our feelings by some such expression of dignified resentment for Bismarck and his act. The gentleman from New York offered a resolution giving voice to this feeling. This House received it, but wisely referred it. For this House, I wish my newspaper friends to notice, while very fast when it means buncombe, is very slow when it means business. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (at the expiration of the six minutes yielded by Mr. CURTIN to Mr. PHELPS) said: The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I hope the gentleman's time may be extended.

Mr. COOK. I ask that the gentleman by unanimous consent proceed with his remarks.

Mr. PHELPS. I am not speaking on either side, but am simply explaining the resolutions——

Mr. GUENTHER. I object, unless the same courtesy be extended to other members of the House.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask permission to print the residue of my remarks.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I must object to every such request unless the objections that have been made on the other side to requests of other gentlemen for leave to print be withdrawn.

Mr. CURTIN. The courtesy has been extended, I understand.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to detain the House more than a moment in speaking upon these resolutions.

Mr. BELFORD. It is impossible on this side of the House to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will suspend his remarks until gentlemen resume their seats and order is restored.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Foreign Affairs gave to the resolutions of the 9th of January careful consideration. It will be noticed that in the report we accept the spirit of the resolutions as offered here and adopted, without any reference to the manner of their passage.

We desired to treat this subject with the dignity becoming the House of Representatives; and we therefore refrained from naming any man connected with the German Empire, as we were dealing with the government of that great country. We refer especially to the agreeable relations which have existed with that country since the formation of this Government, and we express our desire that those relations shall continue. We do not attempt to criticise the internal regulations of the German Empire or the relations of that government to the people or to its legislative body. But we express our sympathy with the German people on the death of an eminent man, who belonged to the people and who served them faithfully for twenty years in the parliament of that country. We commend the conduct of our State Department in its treatment of this delicate question; and we reiterate in our resolutions all that was said in the resolutions of the 9th of January.

The committee desired to maintain the dignity and consequence of this House by continuing to express regret at the death of an eminent man and sympathy for his loss to the people of his own country and to the liberal sentiment of the world. At the same time we have not let the subject down to a bandying of words or to attack any individual connected with the German Empire.

We assert our own dignity in these resolutions and the accompanying report. I therefore now propose we vote on the adoption of the resolutions. Before that vote is taken perhaps I ought to say to the House that immediately after action on the pending resolutions the Committee on Foreign Affairs will submit a further report to the House in answer to the resolution passed by the Liberal Union of the German Parliament couched in words which can not be misunderstood.

Several MEMBERS. Read them now.

Mr. CURTIN. I shall ask those resolutions may be spread upon the Journal of the House.

Mr. HAMMOND. Before the vote is taken I desire to suggest that these objections——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CURTIN. I thought my time had expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for half a minute.

Mr. CURTIN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the unusual objections to printing remarks grew out of misunderstanding on both sides of the House. I hope they will be withdrawn and that gentlemen who have made the request to print the balance of their remarks may be allowed to do so.

Mr. CURTIN. I hope that will be done.

Mr. HAMMOND. As objection came from this side of the House in the first place, I hope it will be withdrawn.

Mr. COSGROVE. I objected first to the extension of time when requested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. OCHILTREE] because when I did it some gentlemen on the other side in a contemptuous manner seemed to question my right to do so, and then under the impulse of the moment I insisted on my objection. After the explanation has been made I now withdraw my objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BRUMM. And I take great pleasure in withdrawing my objection to the printing of remarks by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GUENTHER. I also withdraw my objection.

Mr. CURTIN. All then will have the right to print their remarks which have been objected to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIN. At the request of several members, and in order that the House may understand the action of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in all its extent, I ask the Clerk to read the resolutions which I have referred to as those that committee will report after the pending matter has been disposed of. It can be done in my time and as a part of my speech.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the Liberal Union of the members of the German Parliament, which was introduced by the member from Wisconsin, beg leave to report that the resolution contained in this memorial expresses so just an appreciation of the action of this House and so cordial a wish for the prosperity of our country and of the two nations that it is deemed proper to make a fitting acknowledgment. The committee therefore ask the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House cordially reciprocates the wishes of the Liberal Union of the members of the German Parliament for a closer union of the two nations, and recognizes their graceful appreciation of its sympathy with those who mourn the death of Eduard Lasker.

Resolved, That the House accepts these resolutions, and asks that they be spread upon the Journal.

Mr. CURTIN. I give notice I will present those resolutions from the Committee on Foreign Affairs immediately after the pending resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has now expired.

Mr. GUENTHER. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the time on each side be extended three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAMB and Mr. GEORGE D. WISE objected.

Mr. COX, of New York. As I understand it now debate is entirely exhausted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to recommit the resolutions with instructions to report them back with the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Is it in order now to offer a substitute for the resolutions of the committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not, as the House is acting under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. But I understand this to be a new motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves to recommit the resolutions with the following instructions, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the pending resolutions be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions to report back the following:

"Resolved, That this House does hereby repeat the expression of its sincere regret at the death of the late Eduard Lasker, and offer its sympathy with the Parliament of the German Empire, of which for so many years he was a distinguished member."

Mr. EATON. We have already done that.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Connecticut is out of order, as I can not debate in reply.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection to the House voting on that question, but I protest against a precedent being established thereby against the rules of the House.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to refer that to the Committee on Naval Affairs. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELFORD. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

Mr. COX, of New York. I understand some one moved to refer to the Committee on Naval Affairs. As the House paid no attention to it I will take no notice of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. BELFORD demanded the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were ayes 26.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not a sufficient number.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I ask for a further count.

The House divided; and there were noes 157.

So the yeas and nays were refused.

The motion of Mr. COX, of New York, to recommit with instructions was rejected.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I move to recommit with instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules only one motion to recommit is in order after the previous question is called.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. BRUMM demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. CURTIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIN. I now present the report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which the Clerk has already read.

The resolutions were again read.

Mr. CURTIN. I move the adoption of those resolutions.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I would ask the gentleman to explain what is this Liberal Union of the German Empire to which reference is made?

Mr. CURTIN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GUENTHER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GUENTHER. May I ask if that resolution is not now open to debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not yet before the House for consideration, and will not be open for debate unless the House determines to consider it.

The Chair understands the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] to take the floor and make objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I do not object to its consideration.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CURTIN. I will answer the gentleman from New York——

Mr. BRUMM. After the resolutions were read and were before the House and no objection had been made to their immediate consideration, I understood the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER]. The gentleman from Wisconsin then asked whether debate was in order. I understood the Chair to reply that it was not. I should be glad to know the reason.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair stated that it would not be in order until the House had given unanimous consent to consider the report of the committee. The gentleman from New York was then, as the Chair supposed, objecting to its consideration.

The Chair is now informed that no objection was made, and under the rule the Chair first recognizes the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who submitted the report. Debate under the rule will be in order then, if the previous question be ordered, for fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. CURTIN. I have no desire to say anything on the subject.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I would like to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania answer my question.

Mr. CURTIN. Certainly. What is it?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I wish the gentleman to explain what this Liberal Union is, and why this House should be called upon to act upon the resolution adopted by that union if it is not an official organization?

Mr. CURTIN. I will explain that.

The gentleman from New York interrogates me as to the party sending to this Government the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER]. They represent sixty members of the German Parliament known as the Liberal Union, and during a long period in the life of Dr. Lasker he stood at the head of that organization. They constitute what is known as the liberal branch of the German Parliament; and while the Committee on Foreign Affairs deals with the Imperial Government of Germany as a government, it is thought proper that this House should recognize the sympathy and manner in which that sympathy is expressed by the Liberal Union for the continued prosperity and pleasant relations of the two governments, and at the same time thanking us for the resolution passed by the House in sympathy with the death of Dr. Lasker. That is all. I do not think that there is any need for debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to demand the previous question?

Mr. CURTIN. I do demand it.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I wish I could have said as much for the other resolution. I subscribe to every word of praise uttered here to-day in behalf of Dr. Lasker, whom I learned to love and esteem while he visited this capital last December.

I voted for the motion of the gentleman from New York to lay the former report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon the table for the reason that I am not in favor of any post mortem resolutions. Had the resolution been reported in proper time I should probably have given it my support and voted in favor of it; but at this late day it has lost its force, and it fell as dead as Julius Cæsar upon the country. I should have been in favor of the adoption of proper resolutions at the proper time, that is to say, immediately after the receipt of the message of the President of the United States returning the Lasker resolution, which, while dignified and respectful in character, should be couched in firm and decisive language, and which would have conveyed to the chancellor of the German Empire, as well as to the whole world, the fact that after the dignity of the House of Representatives of the United States had been violated in an entirely uncalled-for manner, in a manner unwarranted by any of its acts or intents, it would not be deluded into submissive acquiescence by any mere Machiavelian phrases.

Considered in the light of former and subsequent evidence, in view of the continued uncalled-for assaults upon our minister at Berlin by the semi-official press of the German Empire with at least the tacit approval if not the direct inspiration of the German Government, the words accompanying the return of the Lasker resolution and the statements in the Reichstag made by the German chancellor can not be given the weight and consideration to which they might have been entitled were his acts, either of commission or omission, in conformity with them.

I do not wish to take up the time of this House much longer on this subject; and in conclusion I wish to state simply as my deepest conviction and belief that the citizens of the United States, whether native-born or naturalized, are not in favor of silently submitting to affronts upon our national dignity not even by the most powerful of nations without resenting them in the most positive manner. [Applause.]

The chancellor of the German Empire must be made to understand that the people of the United States can not be treated with discourtesy and will then silently pocket the same.

Inferentially he ought also be made to see that the American people will not much longer tolerate the uncalled-for treatment of our duly accredited minister at Berlin, a gentleman whose only offense has been to jealously guard and faithfully represent the interests of his country and to carry out the instructions received from our State Department.

If Prince Bismarck wants to show to the Reichstag his lack of respect for that body, or for any of its members, or any of his political opponents, he must not do so at the expense of the dignity of the House of Representatives of the United States.

We mean to treat and we do treat every nation with due respect, and all we ask in return is a like respectful consideration; nothing more, but certainly nothing less. [Applause.]

I yield the remainder of my time, if I have any, to my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Wisconsin and myself are perhaps on the same side. I thought he started out in favor of these resolutions.

Mr. GUENTHER. I started out in favor of the present resolutions in regard to the message of the Liberal Union.

Mr. COX, of New York. Well, Mr. Speaker, it looks to me very much as if the original motion to lay this whole matter on the table should have passed; not because the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee has taken the guardianship of the House and its proprieties, for no one is better fitted for that purpose than himself, but because we are now trying to show ourselves thankful to one portion of the Reichstag only—how large a portion I do not know. It may be a very small or large number. We are trying to express our gratitude and thankfulness to a small number of the Reichstag after being grossly insulted by the "blood-and-iron" minister who sways the great body of its members. This is one of our predicaments to-day.

Then, sir, there is another aspect of our position. We are thanking the members of a particular local organization for thanking us! Are we not thus complicating the matter? Is there not such a way as to lose all the dignity, all the courage, all the Americanism that belongs to this Congress? Let us recur to the old democratic days. Rufus Choate, who was a Republican, became at the end of his life a Democrat. He gave the splendor of his fame and imagery to the party which he said he loved. Why? Because it was the party which in perilous days "had a gay and festive defiance of foreign dictation." Lo! now and here we sit, sir, discussing how best we can put our mouths in the dust before this blood-and-iron chancellor of a blood-and-iron dynasty.

This is not merely a matter of dignity or comity between nations. It is a matter of much higher concern. This manly man Herr Lasker was a type of a great class. He was a friend of labor. He was its interpreter and prophet, its friend and adviser, in a realm where the word of the kaiser was law, and liberty was suppressed by penalty and force. He was the representative of democracy in the larger sense of that term. He was an orator and a splendid type of the great race that has come down to us from the "chosen people" in earlier times. The tribute paid to his memory was also a tribute to the race from which he sprung—a race whose history runs back into the dawn of time. To that race we owe our entire system of ethics and the preservation of the foundations of religion. Amid centuries of glorious nationality and through long ages of intolerance and most cruel persecution, Hebrew virtue, pride, and courage remain untarnished by the hand of time. In everything that broadens civilization, Hebrew genius, intellect, research, and learning stand forth pre-eminent.

What a race has been stricken by the death of this distinguished German and Hebrew? I say it is only a part of the history of persecutions which in this day of the nineteenth century are a humiliation and not to be tolerated in this country. In the Middle Ages one nation alone sacrificed six hundred thousand Jews. They were the flower of science, the devotees of literature, skilled in art, and enthusiastic in poetry. They were men of industry, enterprise, and commerce—honest, social, and hospitable. I would not suffer for a moment that we should give even a possible shadow of excuse for bowing before this terrible specter of persecution.

Twice have I called the attention of the House—on the 21st of May, 1880, and again on the 31st of July, 1882—to the persecutions of the Jews in Russia. We have become used to the persecutions in that country. It is a part of its barbarism. But it is only within the past few years that the same ruthless system of persecution has obtained in Germany. The time of Hebraic liberty will come, and I trust soon, as it has come in this and some countries in Europe, notably in Spain, which has invited the Hebrew exiles of Germany to her shores. To the Hebrew race it is proclaimed by God Himself in Holy Writ: "I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come, and I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of Hosts."

It becomes us especially, who have offered an asylum to these stricken people, and in view of their remarkable attainments in all that civilizes and blesses, that the indirect insult to their race, through one of its distinguished sons, shall receive no mitigation by tenders of semi-sympathy to the organ of autocratic power, even where that power is concealed in the silken glove of an accomplished statesman.

If gentlemen have only noticed the signs of the times in Russia, in Austria, and especially in Germany—where the anti-Semitic movement is fomented by those very nearly connected with Prince Bismarck—they will see the animus of this attempt to humiliate us, or rather of the insult cast upon the American Congress over the dead body of Herr Lasker.

The Constitution of the United States, the people of the United States, all that is elevated in religion and glorious in civil and religious liberty, protest against the measures we have taken so humbly to-day. For one I asked that the resolution offered the other day by my colleague from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], which was dignified, honorable, and consistent, be sent back for reconsideration to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that it might be acted upon in the proper and in the new lights and revelations of debate. The result is that the House of Representatives preferred to salaam before iron and blood, and make republicanism and democracy, here combined, almost a farce.

I know what the good people of the Teutonic races in both hemispheres will think of this meek mockery of reiteration. John Milton, in his famous plea for unlicensed printing—the Areopagitica—said that the old Teutonic tongue never syllabled the words of slavery. The German people gave to the world Magna Charta before it was penned at Runnymede. They favored liberty in the ancient days and primeval forests of Germany, to which Tacitus has given immortalization. Those Goths, so much reviled by the ignorant, bore their fueras for personal and public rights and liberties into Spain in the Dark Ages—whose glory is yet sung in the hymn of Riego. The people of Germany are in accord with the people of this country. I say the people, not the royal personages. But for the great standing armies and the immense power of blood and iron, which means taxation and poverty, emigration and discontent, there would have been perhaps earlier, as there may be in a future day not remote, such an uprising of the old Teutonic element that liberty in her elemental grandeur shall become as resplendent in the Eastern as in our hemisphere. [Applause.]

I trust that the House of Representatives will take no backward step. Let us advance! Why, sir, what have we in America to beg pardon for? For being born? We were born as a people, protesting in our charters, first with our Declaration of Independence and then with our matchless Constitution, against just such titled creatures of feudalism, force, and kingcraft as now rule, vex, and tax Europe. Our protest has been maintained for more than a hundred years. It has gone over oceans and under oceans. Did not its electricity make the French revolution? Did it not create an insurgency of peoples long subject and oppressed? The grandeur which now encircles the republics of France and Switzerland is reflecting the refulgent glory of free government upon the nations around them; and the peoples of the Old World are preparing to dethrone despotism and enshrine liberty.

For one I would not, for any policy of iron and blood, taxes and repression, lower one stripe nor blot out one star upon that flag. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield me a portion of his time.

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. The great trouble with the American Congress has been in all matters in relation to foreign affairs that resolutions have been brought into this body and we have been too cowardly to permit debate and consider them deliberately. Had we in the first place debated this resolution, if there was anything wrong in it debate would have developed it. Now it is too late to draw back. The original resolution was passed by unanimous consent and without debate. One mistake breeds another. And thus we are placed in the humiliating position of first passing a resolution indorsing the contemptible and mean acts of the chancellor of Germany, and then we attempt to place ourselves right by patting those on the back whom we insulted by that very indorsement.

It is carrying water on both shoulders. Talk about dignity! The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. CURTIN] has no apology to make for his acts except dignity. I say that if it be dignified to shrink from every responsibility, if it be dignified to pat the one party on the back and then answer that by patting the other, I for one have never yet learned that miserable kind of dignity. In my judgment true dignity is to be honorable at all times, to be heroic and brave; to express your convictions, and not to play the coward simply because a chancellor might forsooth say that you have not followed the strict rule of parliamentary etiquette.

Mr. CURTIN. I apprehend that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is in favor of these resolutions; is he not?

Mr. COX, of New York. No; I am not now for any of this business.

Mr. CURTIN. You are not?

Mr. COX, of New York. I voted to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CURTIN. Then you are opposed to the sympathy expressed for this country by the Liberal League?

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman can judge from my remarks what I am in favor of.

Mr. CURTIN. Who are you in favor of in Germany, if not of that party which is in favor of freedom and enlarged liberty? And where did the electric spark of which the gentleman speaks so eloquently fall more powerfully than in Germany; and who represent those liberal sentiments but the sixty-five men who signed the paper which we desire to put on record and for which we desire to return our sympathy?

The definition of national honor uttered by my colleague [Mr. BRUMM] would have been very well in place before the resolutions were passed. He, however, seems to be in favor of those resolutions. I assert that there is not one word in the report of the committee, in the preamble or in the resolutions, which does not in proper and significant language express to the German chancellor just what is right and proper on the part of this House. If gentlemen will read the resolutions in the text and between the lines they will not find that those who made that report and brought it to this House fall at all below the lofty standard of morality and honor of which my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] prates so loudly.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS].

Mr. OCHILTREE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OCHILTREE. Will these resolutions be sent through the German chancellor to the Reichstag?

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to inquire how much time I have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, the remarks that have been made since I was interrupted convince me more than ever that the House does not fully understand the resolutions which our committee has reported and that further explanation is necessary.

While we were waiting, holding in our hands the resolutions of the gentleman from New York, a solution of our troubles came to us from powerful and unexpected quarters. The two problems which seemed insoluble fell instantly before the skill of Bismarck and Frelinghuysen. We wished an apology from the German Government because we thought we had meant well, and we did not wish to receive back our resolutions, although a part of them was justly subject to this treatment. Bismarck solved one of these problems, Frelinghuysen solved the other.

The German chancellor instructed the German minister in returning the resolutions to the Secretary of State to say that he would have gratefully received and transmitted the resolutions of the House had they concerned only the personal qualities of the departed statesman, but that he was reluctantly obliged to return them because they contained an estimate of his political opinions which the chancellor believed to be incorrect, and, having that belief, felt himself without authority to deliver them to his Parliament. And when the Secretary of State was tendered the resolutions he could find neither in tradition nor in precedent any authority which would warrant him to accept them, and the Secretary of State returned them to the German minister with the same courtesy with which the German minister had offered them.

Pending those formal efforts of high officials in the two Governments to create a pathway by which we should walk out of our slough, a pleasant incident outside served to warm the atmosphere which surrounded the transaction. The liberal members of the German Parliament passed a resolution of hearty gratitude to us for our action upon the death of their deceased associate, and availed themselves of the same opportunity to express most cordial good wishes.

To wind up the whole matter as far as the Executives of both nations were concerned, and to make the atmosphere still warmer and rosier, the proud chancellor entered the Reichstag for the first time for eighteen months and there formally renewed his disavowal of any intention to express discourtesy or disrespect to this body.

After what had been done by the German chancellor and the American Secretary there was nothing left for our committee to do except to crown their edifice with a becoming capital. We think that we have done this so well as not to merit rebuke but to merit praise. Each man on the committee has refrained from insisting upon much which he would like to have expressed. We were encouraged in this self-sacrifice by the reticence and restraint in the House. We knew that it was hard for the fiery knight from Colorado not to rush down the aisle and tell us that the white dove of peace which we had sent across the German Ocean had come back to us with the same olive branch, and for the gentleman from Texas to watch in silence his fame as it expanded beyond the limits of his own State to the circumference of the world.

In our first resolutions we state that the object of the original resolutions was to express regret for the death of an eminent German statesman, and sympathy with the German Parliament of which he was a member. This is a reiteration of the original. In our second resolution we state that after we had put this communication into the proper channel it was not our business to criticise the relations between the executive and legislative branches of the German Government which had prevented it from reaching its destination. And in the third resolution—for practically the resolutions appended to the two reports form a single series—we acknowledge the receipt of the memorial of the Liberal Union and reciprocate all the cordial wishes which it contains. It will be noticed that there is no word of apology from us and at the same time no word of insult to them. It is a fair solution of a most troublesome matter, and I submit that after accomplishing so much, after saving the dignity of this House, after spreading the fame of Lasker into new regions, after getting the great chancellor into the Reichstag in his new rôle as a complacent and apologetic gentleman, after getting an invitation for the American minister to dine at a state dinner where they may give him American pork, we can in a fair spirit of satisfaction group ourselves around the gentleman from Texas and ring down the curtain upon this international episode.

The question being taken upon the resolution reported by Mr. CURTIN from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, it was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. In order to proceed to the consideration of a contested-election case, I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope we shall have the morning hour and go on with the election case afterward. But if the gentleman desires to press the consideration of the election case, he need not make his motion to dispense with the morning hour, as the election case has precedence over the morning hour.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] I desire simply to say that good faith clearly requires I should make this motion—good faith to gentlemen who have been conferring with me on the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Georgia insist on his motion?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I do.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not a contested-election case of higher privilege than the morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The right of a member to a seat is a question of the highest privilege, but the gentleman from Georgia did not exercise his privilege or claim to call the case up as one of privilege, but contented himself with a motion to dispense with the morning hour.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, to dispense with the morning hour, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 88, noes 72 (less than two-thirds voting in the affirmative).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour commences at 2 o'clock and 45 minutes. The Chair recognizes the call as resting with the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House when the session opened this morning, and am not fully informed as to the status of business. As a parliamentary inquiry I ask what is the order of business now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call of committees.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Then I ask to submit a report from the Committee on Elections. Is not this a privileged motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair stated to the gentleman from Georgia that the report which the Chair understood he wanted to submit was a question of privilege. The gentleman did not see fit, however, to avail himself of that, but contented himself with a motion to dispense with the morning hour, which required a vote of two-thirds for its adoption; and that motion was not agreed to.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask the recognition of the Chair to submit the report of the Committee on Elections on the privileged matter to which reference has already been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that it is not, in his opinion, a usual procedure to interrupt the call of committees for reports in this way, but the Chair recognizes the character of privilege to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Elections is first under call in the morning hour during the call of committees for reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is proceeding with a call left unfinished, and the call now rests with the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUCKNER. Does the Chair decide that the gentleman from Georgia is precluded from submitting his privileged report from the Committee on Elections?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the contrary, the Chair recognizes, as he has already stated, the privileged character of the report from the Committee on Elections. He has stated that in his opinion it is not usual to interrupt the call of committees after a vote has been had to dispense with the morning hour and that motion has been defeated. The present call of committees begins where the former call was left unfinished. The call now rests with the Committee on Claims. The Chair understood the report which the gentleman from Georgia wished to submit was one of the highest privilege, coming as it does from the Committee on Elections and in reference to the right of a member to his seat upon this floor, and that report he can submit at any time at his pleasure.

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman from Georgia insists upon presenting his question of the highest privilege, of course that will displace the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour will not be dispensed with, but it will for the time being be displaced.

Mr. RANDALL. The report which the gentleman from Georgia proposes to submit is undoubtedly one of the highest privilege under the Constitution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not doubt for a moment that the question is one of the highest privilege and may be called up at the gentleman's pleasure.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Then I call it up now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For present consideration?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I desire to submit the report at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Clerk will read it.

VIRGINIA CONTESTED ELECTION—GARRISON VS. MAYO.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, from the Committee on Elections, in the contested election of George T. Garrison vs. Robert M. Mayo, from the first Congressional district of Virginia, submitted a report, concluding with the following resolutions:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Robert M. Mayo was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress from the first Congressional district of Virginia, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That George T. Garrison was duly elected from the first Congressional district of Virginia, and is entitled to the seat.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I ask for the present consideration of the resolutions, and will now demand the previous question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that hasty action ought not to be taken on the resolutions just read, but that the report of the committee should be laid before the House and printed, so members may understand the case.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The resolutions represent the unanimous action of the committee.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is a member of the House who desires to be heard, and it is only right he should be advised of the character of the printed report and have some time for preparation.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HEPBURN. The sitting member.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will afford the gentleman from Virginia ample time to discuss that report.

Mr. HEPBURN. It may be that he is not prepared to discuss the report at this time, and he ought to have an opportunity to examine it and know what it contains.

Mr. MAYO. I ask only for a day.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman I understand only asks for a day to examine the report and prepare his reply.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. For nearly four months the gentleman we think rightfully entitled to a seat on this floor has been excluded, and a good reason ought to be given for his further exclusion from his seat. If the gentleman from Virginia will rise in his place and state that he desires an opportunity to prepare a speech on the question, so as to present the contrary view and to claim the seat upon the arguments he will present, I will not insist on immediate consideration, although I desire here to say that the resolutions which I have had the honor to submit to the House in this case are unanimously agreed to by the members of the committee present at the time. I wish to be understood. I will not consent to a single hour's delay in this case unless the gentleman interested in it, who is to be excluded by the effect of the adoption of the resolution, shall rise in his place and state that in good faith he desires to oppose the adoption of the resolutions and show he is entitled to his seat.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is no desire on the part of any one to unnecessarily delay the action of the House on this matter, but it is only fair that a report of this importance—and it is an important report, and there are many things referred to in it necessary to be understood and upon which members of the House should be advised—it is only fair, I say, that some time should elapse after it has been presented to the House, so it may be printed and examined by members before they are called upon to vote upon it.

It is only fair that it should be printed and laid upon our desks in the usual way. I have not certainly any desire to interpose unnecessary and improper objections to the consideration of this or any other case; but we have a right, I think, to insist upon the printing of the report and time enough to consider it. I think the gentleman from Virginia ought not to be compelled to make the statement which he has been called upon to make. It is unusual, and the action of the committee is not warranted by the exigency of the case.

Mr. MAYO. Mr. Speaker, I have no possible objection to answering fully what I have been called upon to answer by the gentleman in charge of this report. I believe that under the laws of this country I am justly and fairly entitled to my seat on this floor. Leaving out of consideration every technical question known under the election laws of the country, I believe that I am entitled to the place; and I would like to have an opportunity to examine upon what ground these gentlemen have rejected the votes whereon I claim I have a majority and have been duly elected, giving up, as I have said, every technical question. I have not had an opportunity of doing so; and all I ask is that an opportunity be accorded to me.

It is only right, I think, that I should be allowed to examine into the question, and I will say this, that if I am satisfied with the reasoning of the gentlemen on the committee, and that I am not entitled to the place, I shall get up before this House and say so fairly and distinctly.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Virginia state to the House, if he will pardon an interruption, whether he can not proceed to-day to occupy the entire time for debate?

Mr. MAYO. In answer to the gentleman from Georgia I will say that I can not do so without an examination into the question presented by this report, because of the fact that the report to-day, which has just been presented, has taken me considerably by suprise, and I am not in a condition to discuss the matter. I have never seen it except, I will say, by the courtesy of my friend from Georgia, the chairman of the Committee on Elections, who has been courteous in all of his actions in connection with the matter, and who handed me a copy this morning. I should like, therefore, to have an opportunity of examining the report before being called upon to discuss the question presented.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in justice to myself I wish to state that I handed the gentleman from Virginia a copy of the report immediately upon the termination of the session in the Committee on Elections at which the report was agreed to. That was early this morning.

But, further, on the statement which the gentleman from Virginia has made I do not believe that it would be exactly proper to press him to a precipitate discussion of the case. Having in good faith stated, as I understand him, grounds on which he desires to contest the conclusion at which the committee have arrived, he should have an opportunity to do so. With that view, therefore, I acquiesce in his request that it shall go over until to-morrow morning, and I now give notice to the House that I will call it up immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

Mr. SPRINGER. Regular order!

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to reserve points of order on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All points of order will be reserved.

INDIAN MASSACRE IN OREGON IN 1847.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make an examination and investigation into the massacre by Indians of Dr. Marcus Whitman and others, in the Columbia River Valley, in Oregon, in 1847; and to report to this House the names, ages, and sexes of those massacred; and also of all those who survived or escaped said massacre (at said times and places) and now living, with their present places of abode; and what property, kind and value, was destroyed by said Indians, naming them, and to report any and all facts and circumstances relating to said massacre, and to make such recommendations in the premises as the facts by him ascertained may seem to justify.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the present consideration of this resolution.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Under what rule of the House is this a privileged report?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE] rose and stated that he desired to submit a privileged report. He has submitted the resolution just read by the Clerk.

Mr. THOMPSON. Under what rule of the House is it privileged?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not decided that it is a privileged report. The Chair will hear any point of order.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then I raise the point of order that this report is not privileged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] having made a point of order that this is not a privileged report, the Chair is of opinion——

Mr. CALKINS. The resolution comes back from the Committee on Indian Affairs under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that this resolution is not addressed to one of the heads of the Executive Departments, but to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. GEORGE. I claim that it is also directed to the head of the Interior Department. The resolution was introduced and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is now reported back under the rule. It proposes to call upon the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the head of the Indian Bureau, and also upon the Secretary of the Interior, to furnish this information to the House. It seems to me it is privileged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to clause 1 of Rule XXIV, the language of which is "Resolutions of inquiry directed to the heads of the Executive Departments shall be in order," &c. This not being a resolution directed to the head of a Department, it is not a privileged matter. The gentleman can only make it privileged by introducing it again in such a form as to call upon the Secretary of the Interior for this information. The report is not now in order.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I withdraw it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FIEDLER. I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution for consideration at this time.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has.

Mr. THOMPSON. Has it been announced?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMPSON. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is in the nature of an objection.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DOWD. I raise the question of consideration and call for the special order. Let the Clerk read the resolution fixing the special order for to-day. It will be found in the RECORD of the 19th.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is in order. If that be voted down the other motion will be in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering revenue bills.

Mr. RANDALL. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 130, nays 121, not voting 69; as follows:

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. KASSON, on all political questions, for this day.

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to explain why I voted. I was paired with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STRAIT] for thirty minutes, with the understanding that he would vote against this measure and that I should vote for it when it came up. The thirty minutes expired before his return, and on consultation with other members here I cast my vote. I want to make this statement in justice to Mr. STRAIT. He failed to get here within the thirty minutes, and I notified him that I would vote for this measure if it came before the House.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to state that my colleague, Mr. MAYBURY, of Michigan, asked me, before leaving the House, to pair with him on the bonded-whisky bill. I voted on this question not knowing that it included that measure. I am informed, however, that the vote is supposed to affect it. If that is embraced in my pair, I shall withdraw the vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. MAYBURY, is paired with Mr. HART.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then I shall permit my vote to stand.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DORSHEIMER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering revenue bills on the Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask that the revenue bills be reported now in the order in which they stand on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already directed that to be done.

EXTENSION OF THE BONDED PERIOD.

The first business on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse.

Mr. HISCOCK. I object to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the committee rise and report the objection to the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. Under the rule the objection is of itself sufficient to compel the committee to rise and report the objection to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee will now rise and report the objection to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DORSHEIMER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration revenue bills, and having reached the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse, objection was made to its consideration; whereupon under the rule the committe rose, and he reported the objection to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is whether the House will direct the committee to consider that bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is that the way in which the motion should be put, or is it proper to put it in this form: "Shall the objection be sustained?"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let the motion be put in whatever way is required by the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read Rule XXIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. In Committees of the Whole House, business on their calendars shall be taken up in regular order, except bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which shall have precedence, and when objection is made to the consideration of any bill or proposition, the committee shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which shall decide, without debate, whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present; whereupon the committee shall resume its sitting without further order of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House direct the committee to consider this bill?

The question was taken; and the Chair decided that by the sound the "noes" seemed to prevail.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask a division.

Mr. RANDALL. It will save time to have the yeas and nays at once.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 118, not voting 64; as follows:

So the House decided the bill should be considered.

Mr. CLAY. I move to dispense with the reading of the names of members voting.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I object.

The Clerk proceeded to read the names.

Mr. HISCOCK. Since voting I have consented to pair with my colleague, Mr. HEWITT, of New York, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. HURD, on this vote.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. HISCOCK, on this vote. Mr. HEWITT would vote "ay" and Mr. HISCOCK would vote "no."

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, with Mr. OATES, for to-day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session, Mr. DORSHEIMER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has overruled the objection, and directed the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse to be considered. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, and read its title.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise in order that I may present to the House a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] that that motion is not in order at this time. The bill will be reported.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is not the motion that the committee rise in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the time within which distilled spirits heretofore entered for deposit and now remaining in distillery warehouses, or special bonded warehouses, upon which the tax has or shall become due after December 1, 1883, are required to be withdrawn therefrom, pursuant to the conditions of any warehousing bond taken upon the entry of such spirits into any such warehouse under the provisions of existing laws of the United States, shall, on written request of the distiller or owner thereof, be extended for a period not exceeding two years from the date the tax has or would have fallen due upon any such distilled spirits under existing laws; but such extension shall not be made in any case unless a new warehousing bond, in a penal sum not less than the amount of the tax, in a form to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and with sureties satisfactory to the collector of the district in which the warehouse is located, shall be given, conditioned that the principal named in said bond shall pay the tax on the spirits specified therein, and also interest on such tax at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum for the time of the extension, and within five years from the date of the original entry of such spirits for deposit in warehouse. When any distilled spirits upon which the time for payment of the tax shall become extended under the provisions of this act are regauged for withdrawal from warehouse, the allowance for loss shall be no more than is now authorized for a warehousing period of three years; and the tax, and interest on the tax at the rate above named, shall be collected also upon any excess of loss found upon such regauge at the time of the withdrawal of such spirits.

Mr. RANDALL. Now let the report be read.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I now move that the committee rise. I make this motion for the purpose, as I have said, of stating to the House a question of privilege.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Kentucky can wait a moment until the report is read.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I can wait, but I do not know that I have to.

Mr. RANDALL. I merely suggest to the gentleman to wait.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. MORRISON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 5265:

The Committee on Ways and Means, having considered the subject of extending time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse, beg leave to report:

The production of distilled spirits in the United States has become larger than demanded by the market. The taxes are the largest paid by any domestic industry. It suffers in common with other industries from the present depression of trade. The burden from which it chiefly suffers is that directly imposed by the Government. Its relief would probably prevent serious disaster and bankruptcy not only to the interest itself, but to associate business interests. This bill proposes not to relieve any liability for taxes now imposed by law, but simply to postpone their payment for a period not exceeding two years, on condition of further security and of the payment of interest on the postponed taxes at the highest rate (of interest) paid by the Government on any of its bonded debt.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] is recognized.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MORRISON. Having reported this by the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I desire, if it please the Committee of the Whole, to make a short statement as to its purpose and object. As the law now is, the tax on distilled spirits must be paid within three years from the time they are made, and as much sooner——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. But I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will state his question of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I stated, when the Clerk was about to read the report, that I desired to make the motion that the committee rise in order to present to the House a question of privilege. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] I withdrew that motion till the Clerk should have read the report. After the reading of the report I addressed the Chair. I now desire to know whether the Chair proposes to rule me out of order in making the motion that the committee rise in order that I may present to the House a question of privilege affecting, I may say, the proceedings of the House on the very measure we are now to consider?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair respectfully informs the gentleman from Kentucky that when his motion was made it was not in order; and on the completion of the reading of the report the Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee. That gentleman now has the floor.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylania [Mr. BRUMM] will state his point of order.

Mr. BRUMM. I understood the Chair to say that when the gentleman from Kentucky made his motion the Chair declared it out of order. When that motion was made it was made before the bill was read by the Clerk, and the Chair evidently decided properly. But after the bill was reported and before the report was read the gentleman from Kentucky again got the attention of the Chair and made the motion. The Chair did not rule the motion then out of order, but the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE], at the suggestion of the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. RANDALL], said that he would not insist upon his motion at that time, but would permit the report to be first read.

Now, the point of order that I raise is this: Does the Chair contend that, having recognized the gentleman from Kentucky before the report was read for the purpose of making that motion, and the gentleman from Kentucky having addressed the Chair after the report was read, he having permitted the report to be read at the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Chair will then recognize another gentleman without allowing the gentleman from Kentucky to submit his motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair respectfully says to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] that the Chair can not enter into any discussion as to whether his ruling is correct or incorrect. The rules of the House point out the manner in which the decision of the Chair may be reviewed, if any member so desires. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I regret very much to appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I will do so, and do so upon my responsibility as a man and as a Representative on this floor and upon the rules of the House.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is: Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. KEIFER. Desiring simply to preserve the good conduct of the House, I think, with all due respect to the Chair, that there is no such thing as an appeal from a recognition by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thanks the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] for referring him to a well-known parliamentary rule. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal of the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. MORRISON. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] I will proceed to say what I was about to say when interrupted, that as the law now is the tax on distilled spirits——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not yield.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I know you do not; but the rules of the House will prevail in this committee or we will have disorder, one or the other.

Mr. MORRISON. There is always disorder where the gentleman is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will state his point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. On page 356 of the Digest questions of privilege are defined. They are as follows:

> Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their Representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

Now I rise in my place here and state to the Chair that I desire to go back into the House in order to present to the House a question of the highest privilege. I will state it to the Chair if he desires to know what it is. It is that a member of the whisky ring is now on this floor, to which he has been admitted under a rule of the House after having first subscribed his name on the register to a statement that he has no interest in any bill pending before this body. Yet within a few days after he took that card of admission to the floor of this House he was found before the Committee on Ways and Means addressing that committee in favor of the bill which is now before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will my colleague allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Wait a moment. That member of the whisky ring has been on the floor repeatedly since and is on the floor now, as is also the editor of the Courier-Journal, from a town where there is more whisky in bond than in any other town in the United States.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is no point of order, and the gentleman has no right to be heard on it and he knows it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] has not stated a point of order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] and the committee can take the responsibility; I have done my duty.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to state that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] has presented no point of order and he knows it, or ought to know it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I say it is a point of order, and that I am entitled to be heard on a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided the point of order. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. You may bulldoze this whisky bill through the House, but the coming election will condemn you. [Renewed cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order, and gentlemen will take their seats. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] will proceed.

Mr. MORRISON. When interrupted I was about to say that as the law now is the tax on distilled spirits must be paid within three years from the time they are made, and as much sooner as they are sold and removed from the warehouse. The object of this bill (and the effect of it if it shall become a law) is to extend the time for the payment of the tax on spirits now in warehouse, on condition of new guarantees and the payment of interest on the amount of the tax extended.

If this business of converting grain into alcohol exists only to be taxed, then the beneficiaries of this bill ought to have no footing here and no consideration from Congress. But regarding it as a legitimate branch of manufacturing industry, it is entitled to be placed on an equal basis with all other industries—on the same basis with other industries or interests subject to internal taxes.

In the last twenty years the men engaged in this business have paid into the Treasury of the United States more than one thousand millions of dollars; and this distilling interest is to-day the source from which you derive more than one-fifth of all your revenue. When the law imposing internal taxes was first enacted all these taxes were paid when the articles upon which they were levied were sold and went into consumption, and not before. Taxes are so paid yet on tobacco and malt liquors—on everything upon which we impose internal-revenue taxes except this one interest now asking for this extension.

They are so paid in all other countries where internal taxes are levied. So levied, paid, and collected, they are taxes on consumption, not on production. When taxes are so levied and collected men pay on what they use or destroy, not on what they make or produce.

This law was so amended in 1868 as to require immediate payment of taxes on this one article of production. It was so changed because at that time there were in connection with the collection of these taxes great abuses and frauds, although abuses and frauds were not singular to this distilling business. They existed in the collection of customs revenue. They were everywhere quite too common. In the several years first after the war in all the public service of State, county, and city, as well as the National Government, these frauds and abuses existed. When we had grown away from that condition, the time within which these taxes should be paid was extended one year and afterward to three years—a period ordinarily sufficient, but not always so.

It is estimated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that in the last year, besides the distilled spirits that were regularly taken from warehouses and taxes paid upon them, there was, under this three-year law, forced out 3,000,000 gallons upon which the payment of taxes was enforced, these 3,000,000 gallons being wholly without a market—a surplus. In the next two years 70,000,000 gallons must pay taxes, and for much of this there is no market.

The Commissioner estimates the surplus for which there will be no sale, surplus of the whiskies already made and now in warehouse, at 45,000,000 gallons, and on all of this taxes must be paid in the next two years. To carry or to keep in store this surplus or oversupply large sums of money have been and will need to be invested, borrowed and loaned, involving in threatened bankruptcy not only the producers of and dealers in whisky, but bankers and merchants as well. This money was advanced and invested upon the reasonable expectation that it would be returned within three years upon the sale of these whiskies and before the expiration of the tax-paying period.

In order that these people may not go into bankruptcy, or, in other words, to save what they have already invested, large sums will be needed in addition to those now invested in this surplus; because to keep this 45,000,000 gallons in the warehouse without paying taxes the owners have already invested only ten or twelve million dollars; but to keep it in store tax-paid will require $50,000,000.

But it may be said, "Why shall we grant this relief? Did not these manufacturers of whisky or distilled spirits know what the law was? Did they not know when this tax would become due? Why did they manufacture more than they could sell or pay taxes upon?" The answer is simply this, that in the years when this whisky was made everything was overdone. Excessive production was not confined to this industry or business; it was common to all the large producing interests of the country.

At one time the distillers attempted to establish, and thought they had established, an export trade, from which they expected a large and profitable market. During a very short period they exported, I believe, 65,000,000 gallons, a quantity nearly equal to the entire production of a single year. But our foreign commerce was so embarrassed and hedged about with restrictions that our people were finally unable to sell the alcoholic product of our grain in the European markets at a profit. The French were our principal customers for this product; but even in France the Germans had an advantage of 12 cents a gallon over us, an advantage equal to 50 per cent. or one-half the cost of the export.

Germany made war on France, battered down her walls, overturned her government, and compelled payment of the cost of grim-visaged war. We fight both with commercial restrictions—a protective war tariff maintained against ourselves. As a consequence we must sell our grain in alcohol, if we sell at all in the French market, in competition with the countrymen of the ill-natured Bismarck, at the disadvantage of one-half its cost.

When we put our grain into hogs—make pork of it—neither France nor Germany will take it at all. [Laughter.] Commercially, we have so behaved that in the countries where we must sell our surplus grain nobody wants anything to do with us.

But suppose it be true, fellow-citizens—I mean Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.] I do not occupy as much of the time of the House as some gentlemen, and therefore may be pardoned if I sometimes mistake or miscall my audience.

Mr. THOMPSON. We are only fellow-citizens at last.

Mr. MORRISON. Suppose it to be true, Mr. Chairman, that this surplus or oversupply is purely the result of the speculative or money-getting spirit of our people. Is that a good and sufficient reason why an industry of this magnitude should not be relieved when it can be and is proposed to be done without cost to the Government?

No guarantees for payment are lost or surrendered. New bonds are to be taken to secure final payment of all taxes with interest to be paid at 4½ per cent., the highest rate which the Government pays on its own indebtedness.

Suppose the payment of these taxes to be extended at 4½ per cent. interest shall be enforced under existing law at once when they are due, we at once pay out the money on a bond that bears but 3 per cent.; and I ask again, what has the Government to gain by enforcing payment of taxes on whiskies before they are sold or go into consumption?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. When the extension was granted to them a few years ago, by the terms of the law these distillers promised 5 per cent. interest. Now, did they pay it?

Mr. MORRISON. I suppose they could be made to pay it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Did they not in a subsequent Congress get relief from that tax, and will they not do it again? Is not this an act to enable them not to pay anything at all, not only the payment of interest on the taxes but the payment of the taxes themselves?

Mr. MORRISON. I am not familiar with former legislation on that subject or with the action of the Government in that respect. I never saw the inside of a still-house. There is not one in my district, and, so far as I know, not one of my constituents has any interest in the subject now before the House. I am acting in this as I do on every public question. New securities and new bonds are required under this bill, and should be in all like cases, and I presume there is absolutely nothing of substance in the gentleman's question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The point I make is, they did not pay before, and, in my judgment, neither will they pay this time.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to answer my colleague, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me.

Mr MORRISON. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON. When they extended the bonded period before they required interest should be paid on whisky on which the tax was extended at the rate of 5 per cent. There was at that time only 6,000,000 of gallons of whisky on which it was extended. The effect of Congress coming in and extending the bonded period relieved the market, and all that whisky went into consumption almost immediately under the demands of the trade. It was continued on such a small amount that the whole sum collected of interest was but $75,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And that they did not pay.

Mr. THOMPSON. In 1880 when the Carlisle bill, so called, crystallized that joint resolution of 1878 into law they took off the charge of interest because they realized nothing from it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then my colleague admits they did not pay the interest.

Mr. THOMPSON. They did pay the interest at that time.

Mr. WILLIS. The answer is that they did pay it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, they did pay it.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not know whether they will pay it or not. They will, unless some Congress comes in and releases them. I can not tell about that. I only know that I shall never relieve whisky from the payment of taxes.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And this is one step in that direction.

Mr. MORRISON. It may be if you have the execution of the law. [Laughter.] It is not my purpose to relieve them of anything. When this bill came to my hands it did not provide for payment of interest. That provision was inserted in it on my own motion.

Now, I was about to say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STRUBLE. I rise to a question of order. I went over to the seat of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] and could not find for myself any seat there and I could not possibly hear him. I cannot hear him here, and I hope he will agree to take a position somewhat more central in the House, and then we will all be able to take our seats and hear what is going on.

Mr. MORRISON. I have but little more to say. I was saying the Government had nothing to gain by the enforcement of taxes at an earlier time than articles which paid them went into consumption; and for the reason that if you force out to-day more than is used, less will go out to-morrow. If you take out more this six months than goes into consumption, less will go out the next six months. At last you get the taxes on what the people consume, and no more.

Production, Mr. Chairman, is coming down; in fact it is already down to the demand for annual use. In 1881, three years ago, 117,000,000 of gallons were made, and in the last year but 74,000,000 of gallons, and this is about the quantity which our people annually use. It has been said that this is special legislation, or class legislation, that it is legislation in behalf of a specially interested few.

Mr. Chairman, that can not be true. This bill gives but partial relief to an interest (the largest tax-paying interest in the country) specially legislated against, and does not yet put it on an equality with other interests equally special on which internal taxes are levied, tobacco and malt liquors. So far as this bill goes its effect is to undo special legislation.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue recommends the passage of this bill. I ask the Clerk to read——

Mr. RANDALL. Is that the late Commissioner of Internal Revenue?

Mr. MORRISON. No; the new, Commissioner Evans.

Mr. STRUBLE. I have been in my seat, but I can not hear what is going on. It is impossible to hear the gentleman from Illinois from this locality, and I would request that he take a position more in the center of the Hall, so members can hear what he has to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no power to give effect to the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. MORRISON. I have but little more to say. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked from the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose duty it is to collect this tax or have it collected.

The Clerk read as follows:

If the subject were any other than whisky there would probably be but very little difficulty. Viewing it in the abstract, as I have conceived it my duty to do, it seems that the name or quality of the article should not make any difference in determining a plain business proposition such as I suppose this to be. It was long since made a business matter by the Government in its mode of dealing with it.

I have looked at the subject in its revenue aspects only, without reference to any theory of morality which may be supposed to be involved in it, and with which, indeed, in my present position, I could properly have nothing whatever to do, and I unhesitatingly say that I can see no objection to the proposed legislation so long as provision is made for the perfect security of the Government for the ultimate payment of the whole amount due, together with interest at the rate of at least 4½ per cent. during the time of the extension, and so long as it is provided that there shall be no allowance for loss by leakage or evaporation during the extended period.

Mr. MORRISON. That is what Mr. Commissioner Evans, the chief of the Internal Revenue Department, says.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. It is impossible to hear the gentleman from Illinois. This is an important bill, and the House ought to be able to hear the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means upon it. I wish he would take a position nearer the center of the Hall, so that all may hear him.

Mr. MORRISON. I shall not occupy the floor for many minutes longer.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that the Commissioner recommends the passage of this bill. In the last Congress——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, if he is not aware of the fact that the ex-Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Green B. Raum, recommended this in the last Congress, and that the Secretary of the Treasury recommended to the Senate that it should not pass? Now, has the gentleman in charge of this bill any recommendation from the Secretary of the Treasury? Has he any authority of the Secretary of the Treasury that this is a good bill?

Mr. MORRISON. I have not stated that I had.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me for a moment, I desire to answer the question of my colleague from Kentucky.

Mr. MORRISON. Very well.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say in reply to his question that the bill now pending before this House was recommended by Charles J. Folger, the Secretary of the Treasury, in the identical letter which my colleague referred to. Here is the exact wording——

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask, then, that it be put into the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIS. This House passed a bill providing for unlimited extension of the bonded period. It went to the Senate. Now, here is a letter from the Secretary, and I quote an extract:

I may be permitted to add that I am satisfied—

This letter was written on the 21st day of April, 1882—

that an immediate attempt to collect the tax upon the spirits now in store would be oppressive and ruinous to many. I am therefore not in antagonism to legislation that shall give temporary aid to an important branch of business. I believe it to be needed and that it may be so accorded as to be healthful to all. This can be effected by a prolongation, but for a fixed period, of the time for which spirits may remain in store without payment of tax.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. WILLIS. That letter is dated on the 21st of April, 1882.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask that the entire letter be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from Kentucky must excuse me from yielding further to him.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. It will show, if printed in full, that Secretary Folger, at the same time, said that this bill was a big steal.

Mr. MORRISON. After yielding so often I have said I did not yield further. Has this man no limit to his persistency?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. MORRISON. That is the first time you have thanked me for it, though it has been several times extended. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that in the last Congress, when five of the present members of the Ways and Means Committee were members of that committee, when the Speaker of the present House [Mr. CARLISLE], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. TUCKER], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL], and myself also were among its members, that committee reported to this House, so far as I know without a single objection, when the necessity was not so urgent as now, a bill extending the time—not for two years, but indefinitely, not requiring the payment of 4½ per cent. interest, but without interest. That bill passed the House, as I remember, unchallenged. There was lying upon our table when the last Congress adjourned a bill passed by the Senate extending the time for two years without interest.

Mr. WILLIS. With interest; the very bill Mr. Folger suggests.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from Kentucky states that the Senate bill required interest; as to that I seem to be in error. Mr. Chairman, if these precedents and the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner are not sufficient to secure the passage of this bill, then I need to say nothing more in support of it.

I believe, sir, with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that if this House was dealing with any other subject than whisky there would be no question about the passage of this bill.

Whenever the Government has the financial ability, the unquestioned right, and the undoubted constitutional power to grant relief to a great number of its citizens engaged in a large and important tax-paying industry, that relief should be granted, when, as in this case, it can be done without cost to the Government or people.

This bill, if it is passed, will not cost the Government of the United States one cent. Nor will it increase the burdens of a single one of our fifty-five millions of people to the extent of a hundredth part of a single farthing. Therefore I think one of the imperative duties imposed upon Congress is to pass the bill.

I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the people of Illinois, the people of Kentucky, of Ohio, and of half a dozen other States, my own included, are deeply, vitally interested in the passage of this bill. I wish to say that letter after letter and hundreds of telegrams have come to every member on this floor from these States urging the passage of the bill. But I wish further to say that we do not, even if we had a majority, wish to push the bill through by any railroad system. If there is anything wrong in it we want it to come out. If there is anybody that wishes to make inquiry about it we want to answer their questions.

But as it is now late I shall yield the floor to my colleague for the purpose of making a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is evident that we can not finish the discussion of this bill this evening. I will therefore move that the committee rise in order that we may begin it early to-morrow, and I hope will be able to get through with it before the setting of to-morrow's sun.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DORSHEIMER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse and had come to on resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before submitting the motion to adjourn the Chair will lay before the House some personal requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HEWITT, of New York, until Tuesday next, on account of ill-health.

To Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, until the 4th of April, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUNT, for two days, on account of important and urgent business.

To Mr. MCCOMAS, until Tuesday next.

To Mr. HOPKINS, for three days.

CONTESTED ELECTION—GARRISON VS. MAYO.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] yields to me for a moment that I may ask unanimous consent to have the report of the Committee on Elections on the contested-election case of Garrison vs. Mayo printed in to-morrow's RECORD.

Mr. RANNEY. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky will state his question of privilege.

Mr. MILLS. I submit to the Chair that the motion to adjourn now pending is of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It had escaped the attention of the Chair that the gentleman from Texas had entered a motion to adjourn. The gentleman from Texas insists on that motion.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Texas insist on that motion in order to aid the whisky bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. MILLS. I do not.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If the gentleman insists on his motion for that purpose, I desire to give him notice I shall be heard yet.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 20, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of B. W. Hunter and others, citizens of Maryland and the District of Columbia, praying that a survey for a ship-canal may be made from a point on the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River to the Chesapeake Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON presented resolutions adopted by Tippecanoe Post, No. 51, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, of Monticello, Ind., in favor of the passage by Congress of the measures recommended by the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in relation to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KENNA. I present the memorial of a number of citizens of the Kanawha Valley, State of West Virginia, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 1441) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River, and to prescribe the dimensions of the same. I ask its reference to the Committee on Commerce, and in that connection I desire the Chief Clerk to read the passage I have marked in the RECORD of February 8, containing a statement made by me on introducing the bill against which this remonstrance is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). If there be no objection it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KENNA. In introducing this bill I desire to say that there is a difference of opinion as to the propriety of the height of the bridges authorized by it to be constructed so as not to interfere with navigation. Therefore I have left the height blank. There are also other provisions of the bill which I have not personally investigated to which I wish to give some attention and perhaps make some suggestions about. There is a general desire to have the bridges, but likewise a universal feeling against interference with navigation. I shall place all available information on the subject before the committee, and hope that if the bill is not now it may be so formulated as to permit the bridges and save harmless the navigation.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to add to the observations which the Chief Clerk has just read from the RECORD the statement that this remonstrance is largely the result of misapprehension or misrepresentation of both the bill introduced by me and the object of its introduction. I desire to add further for the information of those who have signed the remonstrances that the bill introduced by me was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and by them at my request it went to the Department, and through the Department to the engineers in charge of the improvement of the Great Kanawha River. It has already been subjected to close scrutiny by the engineers, who will shortly make their report, and I am informed recommend modification in the present bill. It will go through a like process by the committee, and I am quite confident that no gentleman on this floor or on the floor of the other House would give his vote to any bill which will in any way interfere with the navigation of that river. Upon full information every requirement of the navigation will be carefully guarded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PENDLETON presented a memorial and resolution of the Toledo Produce Exchange, in opposition to all provisions of law similar to those contained in House bill 5918, regulating the lake marine; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GROOME. I present resolutions of the Legislature of Maryland, asking Congress to pass legislation in favor of refunding to that State certain moneys advanced to the Government in 1790 for the purpose of erecting public buildings. I ask that they may be read.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Claims, as follows:

[Chapter 60.]

Whereas the State of Maryland did in the year 1790 advance the sum of $72,000 to the use of the General Government to be applied in such manner as Congress shall direct toward erecting public buildings; and

Whereas the General Assembly did on the 11th day of February, 1843, by resolution request our then Representatives in Congress to obtain the passage of a law refunding said sum with the interest thereon to the State; and

Whereas the said sum of money so as aforesaid advanced to the Government of the United States has not yet been refunded to the State, although frequent requests therefor have been made; and

Whereas several reports have been made to Congress by the committees thereof at various times, all agreeing that said sum of money is justly due and owing to the State of Maryland, and the bills for the repayment thereof have several times been passed by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States but never by both during the same Congress: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That our Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use their best endeavors to obtain the passage of a law by Congress to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the State of Maryland the sum of $72,000, with interest, which was so as aforesaid advanced by the State to the General Government in the year 1790 for the purpose of erecting public buildings.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be respectfully requested to forward a copy of these resolutions, under the great seal of the State, to our Representatives in Congress.

J. PEMBROKE THOM,
Speaker of the House of Delegates.
HENRY LLOYD,

Approved March 7, 1884.
[SEAL.]

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand as clerk, and affixed the seal of the said court of appeals, this 8th day of March, A. D. 1884.

I, Robert M. McLane, governor of the State of Maryland, do hereby certify that Spencer C. Mr. McMILLAN presented the petition of Sarah B. Stearns, C. M. Coleman, Mary E. Murdoch, Dr. Anna M. Brockway, George W. Kimberly, Mrs. E. S. Hammond, and 81 others, citizens of the State of Minnesota, praying the passage of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FARLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 54) for the relief of Wilbur F. Cogswell, to report adversely thereon and recommend its indefinite postponement.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. FARLEY. I was about to make a statement, but I see the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] here.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to submit the views of the minority on the bill, and I ask that the bill may take its place on the Calendar. I do not agree with the majority of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection such will be the order.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1664) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of David Wood, deceased, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1665) for the relief of John W. Cator, surviving partner of the firm of Aymar & Co., of New York city, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I give notice that to-morrow I shall endeavor to have it considered.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 719) to provide for the refund of excess of duties assessed and collected on imports of raw sugars, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am requested to introduce a bill, and I do so without committing myself to any of its provisions.

The bill (S. 1888) to incorporate the Trust and Indemnity Company of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANSOM (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1889) to continue in force for one year, eight months, and five days the act of Congress "to confirm the term for the period of seventeen years from the date of its original grant of the patent of Thomas A. Weston," approved May 27, 1878; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a bill (S. 1890) to provide for the erection of a post-office at Fortress Monroe, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1891) for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Yorktown, Va., and making an appropriation therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1892) relating to the pay of retired officers of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1895) granting a pension to Christopher P. Davidson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. GROOME, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of the owners of the schooner Addie B. Bacon be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMERICAN SILK FLAG.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

Resolved, That the silk flag presented by Mr. Joseph Neumann, of California, to the Senate and accepted by the Senate on the 12th day of July, 1870, the said flag being it is believed the first American flag made of American silk, be deposited in the Smithsonian Institution for exhibition and preservation.

EXPENSES OF STAR-ROUTE CASES.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate copies of the accounts and vouchers of the disbursing agent of the Department of Justice for miscellaneous expenses relating to the star-route cases during the last three years.

REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIER ROLLS.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to inform the Senate whether the Commissioner of Pensions has in his possession the rolls of Revolutionary soldiers belonging to any of the States; if so, how said rolls came into his possession or the possession of the United States; whether there is any reason why the same should not be returned to the States from which they were received, and, if the same are needed for use by the United States, whether written or printed copies of the same can not be substituted for the originals without detriment to the public interest.

SCHOONER DRUID.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," that order of business will be closed.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill (S. 1847) to authorize the issuing of a register to John S. McQuin and J. Warren Wonson for the schooner Druid, the last bill upon the Calendar, for present consideration, and I ask to make a brief statement of the reason why I ask consent to take it up.

A short time ago a war vessel of the United States ran down at sea a vessel belonging to Nova Scotia, near the Nova Scotia coast. It was a clear case of the fault of the officer of the United States vessel. A court-martial was held by order of the Navy Department, and the court-martial found that the United States officer was guilty of gross negligence and sentenced him to be suspended for two years, which sentence is now in force, having been approved by the President.

The wreck of the vessel run down was towed by our vessel into Massachusetts; and was there purchased by two Massachusetts citizens, who have expended upon the wreck twice as much as the cost of the wreck itself. They now ask to have an American register issued to that vessel, the law requiring that they should have expended three times as much in ordinary cases; but in this case, of course the United States being liable to pay the entire injury to the vessel injured, all that the purchasers pay is clear gain to the United States. Therefore, the Committe on Commerce supposed that it was a case where the special authority to issue an American register might properly be granted.

It is important, as the vessel is lying at the wharf and can not go to sea, that the bill should pass at once, and if it can pass the Senate this morning it can pass the House on private-bill day to-morrow.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I simply desire to say in relation to this matter that the House sent over a general bill which it was supposed would cover this case, but in my opinion and in the opinion of several other members of the Committee on Commerce the general bill would not cover this case; it would have to be retroactive in order to do it. Therefore the Committee on Commerce withhold any report on the general bill to further consider it. I can not see the slightest objection to issuing the register to this vessel by name.

Mr. MILLER, of California. As I understand the bill, it appears that the repairs cost twice as much as the original cost of the vessel.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Then what is the use of any act, because it will come under the general law?

Mr. HOAR. The repairs would have to cost three times as much.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The repairs would have to cost three-quarters of the original cost of the vessel, not three times as much.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, no; three times three-quarters of the cost of the vessel when completed, as we understand it.

Mr. FRYE. We have examined it. The statute does not cover this case.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Why should there be an exception made in this case?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator had listened to my statement he would have heard me say that this vessel was run down by a United States vessel. Every cent that these men paid for the wreck saves the United States just so much expense. In my judgment they should get an American register under the circumstances if it had only cost a quarter as much for repairs, because otherwise it has got to be broken up and sold for old truck. There has been a court-martial of the officer of the United States war vessel that ran her down. The officer was found guilty of gross negligence and suspended for two years, and the sentence is in force at present.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Does the United States have to pay the damage?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; the United States is liable for the damage. Where it occurs in American waters we always give a special authority to go to the Court of Claims or a district court, but this occurring in foreign waters, the foreign government can make demand on our Government.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I see no objection to the bill.

Mr. FRYE. There is no objection to it.

Mr. VEST. I merely want to say that I agreed in committee to report this bill, and I shall make no opposition to it, but I wish it distinctly understood that I enter a protest against that clause of the navigation laws which requires that when an American citizen purchases a vessel that is damaged or wrecked he shall pay three times as much for repairs as the original purchase-money in order to be entitled to an American register. I agreed to this measure because the general navigation law is still upon the statute-book, but I am opposed to the whole principle, and I do not want myself committed to any such thing as an approval of that legislation as it now exists because I do not oppose this bill. The whole thing is wrong in my judgment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1314) to change the name of the James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City, Nebr.; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COKE. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 48. I will remark that I would not ask to take the bill up out of its order if I were satisfied that the Senate would go to the Calendar and proceed with it, as it might be reached this morning in a very short time. It is an important bill, and I ask unanimous consent to take it up.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. What is the bill?

Mr. COKE. It is the bill to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on various reservations.

Mr. HOAR. That is a long bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is a general bill, and I have no doubt will excite a great deal of discussion, and if it is taken up it will occupy not only the morning hour this morning but in all probability the morning hour for a week to come. I hope the Senator from Texas will not ask to take up that bill at this time.

Mr. COKE. I will state to the Senator, if he will permit me, that this bill passed the Senate once in the morning hour without any discussion at all, and since that time universal expressions of approval have come up from all portions of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). This debate is proceeding of course by unanimous consent, as the rule is against debating a motion to take up a bill. Does the Senator from Texas move to proceed to the consideration of a bill?

Mr. COKE. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to object to taking up the bill?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will not object.

Mr. COKE. Then I make the motion.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make an inquiry. Was there not unanimous consent given yesterday that the bill which was discussed, and which stood at the head of the Calendar until it was recommitted, the district court salary bill, should be at the head of the Calendar this morning?

Mr. COKE. I think not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not then in the chair. He is informed, however, that there was objection to that request.

Mr. HOAR. I did not hear the objection.

Mr. HARRIS. There was objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such is the information of the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS. Hence I think the Senator from Massachusetts gave notice that he would move to proceed to the consideration of the bill this morning.

Mr. HOAR. I gave notice that I would move it. If the Senator's bill will only take a few minutes I certainly do not wish to make an objection, especially as I have just had the indulgence of the Senate myself. If it is to be a long general debate, I think it will be my duty to move to take up the other bill, which stood in its position at the head of the Calendar as of right and then it was recommitted in my absence, and it was debated very thoroughly yesterday, so that there will not be, of course, a great deal more of debate. Some other gentlemen wish to speak on it.

Mr. COKE. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that I make this motion at the suggestion of, and in entire accord with, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who like myself very much desires that the bill shall be taken up and considered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire if there would be objection to unanimous consent to taking up the district judges' salary bill after the bill of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. I shall not make any objection to that proposition.

Mr. HARRISON. As we have considered the judicial bill and there has been some debate upon it, I hope the Senator from Texas will consent that we may proceed to the consideration of that bill and finish it, and then take up the bill which he has mentioned. The judicial has been under discussion, and the longer it is put off the more likely we are to have the discussion repeated. I think we can finish it very soon, and then I am sure there will be unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to consider the bill which the Senator from Texas wishes to bring before the Senate.

Mr. COKE. I will consent to that arrangement with the understanding that Senate bill No. 48 shall be proceeded with after the judicial bill is disposed of.

Mr. HARRISON. Very good.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up the judicial bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas withdraws his motion to take up the bill indicated by him, and the Senator from Massachusetts moves to take up the judicial salary bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

SALARIES OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1852) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill:

Provided, That this act shall apply only to judges that shall be hereafter appointed.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I feel it my duty to submit some observations to the Senate in opposition to this bill. I do not believe that salaries ought to be regulated by the ability of the Government to pay or even exclusively by the value of the services rendered. The standard for the regulation of the salaries of officers of all kinds in my judgment is a reference to the gains in private life of men in the locality in which the duties of the office are to be discharged. I say a fair average of the gains in private life of men in that locality who are competent to fill and discharge the duties of the office is the proper standard. Anything more than that makes the office more desirable, more valuable than the public interests require. Anything less than that would fail to secure the services of competent men to discharge the duties of the office. I do not believe that the salaries of officers should be fixed either for the purpose of enriching or impoverishing the incumbent. I think his gains, his salary, or his fees, whatever they may be, should be so regulated as to give a moderate and fair compensation for his labor and for his services, without making the position exceptionally profitable or exceptionally desirable in the community in which he discharges his duty.

The desirability of an office to a good man is not composed alone of the fees or profits which he may gain by it. There is a generous ambition in the hearts of good men which makes them seek to obtain possession of power and office for the purpose of using it for the public good and for the purpose of winning for themselves an honorable fame for honorable and useful public service. I do not think the salaries of officers ought to be so regulated as to obscure or depress that motive. I do not think that in regulating official salaries we ought to appeal to the avarice of men rather than to their sense of justice and their honorable ambition to serve the public.

Public officers, on the theory of our Government, are public servants. This position should never be forgotten and should be kept steadily in view. To be a servant of the public includes the idea to some extent of personal sacrifice. It means serving a master, and not serving one's self. It excludes the idea of such advantages derived from the position as place the incumbent exceptionally in a better condition than those whom he serves. Taxation is restricted to the legitimate wants and needs of the Government; it can not be justly used to enrich officials of any class or unnecessarily to grant liberal largesses to any class of men.

Our fathers in the beginning of this Government acted on this rule. They did not give these large and enormous salaries. They calculated largely upon the patriotism and public spirit of officials in order to have offices well and properly filled. I have during the last night looked over the legislation of Congress upon the subject of official salaries from the beginning down to the present, and I desire to bring the facts before the Senate.

In 1789, in the very first bill that ever was passed on this subject, a bill approved by Washington, the salary of the supreme judges of the United States was fixed at $3,500; in 1819 the salary was made $4,500; in 1855 the salary was fixed at $6,000. I am speaking now of the salaries not of the inferior judges, but of the supreme judges. At that figure it remained as long as the Democratic party was in power in this country. In 1871 the salaries of the supreme judges were fixed at $8,000, and in 1873 at $10,000, the present amount.

The district judges by the act of 1789 had salaries as follows: The district judge of Maine had $1,000; of New Hampshire, $1,000; of Massachusetts, $1,200 (in 1819 it was raised in Massachusetts to $1,600); in Connecticut it was $1,000, and so far as my researches go the salary of the district judge of Connecticut, fixed by the act of 1789 at the sum of $1,000, was not changed until 1836. In New York the salary, under the act of 1789, was $1,500; in 1819 it was raised $100, to $1,600. In New Jersey the salary was put at $1,000; in Pennsylvania it was $1,600, and when the western district of that State was formed, in 1818, the judge of that district had $1,600. In Delaware the salary was put at $800. Two hundred dollars was added to that in 1795, and in 1819 it was raised to $1,600, and in a subsequent statute the unprecedented thing was done in the history of official salaries that it was reduced $100, so as to put it at $1,500. In Maryland the salary was $1,500; in Virginia, $1,800, and in 1818 a western district was formed for Virginia, and the salary of that district judge was fixed at $1,600. In Kentucky it was fixed at $1,000, and in 1803 raised to $1,500. In South Carolina the salary was fixed at $1,800; in Georgia, $1,500.

These were the salaries under the act of 1789.

North Carolina was not a member of the Union at that time. The salary fixed for the district judge in that State by the act of 1790 was $1,500. Rhode Island at the same time came into the Union and had a district judge, and his salary was fixed at $800. Vermont in the same year having become a member of the Union, a district court was established there with a salary of $800 for the judge, $200 being added to it in 1795. In Tennessee, in 1796, the salary of the district judge was fixed at $800, raised in 1802 to $1,500. In Ohio, on her admission into the Union, the salary of the district judge was fixed at $1,000. In Louisiana, in 1803, the salary of the district judge was $3,000; larger than any salary up to that time that had been given to any district judge in the Union. In Indiana, admitted in 1817, the salary was fixed at $1,000, and in Mississippi at $2,000.

And in that very singular piece of judicial legislation performed in the closing hours of John Adams's administration, when a bill was passed, avowedly almost, for the purpose of giving patronage to the Federal party, then in its last hours of life, when I believe sixteen circuit judges were created, the salaries of those officers were fixed at $2,000, except in the sixth circuit, and in that circuit the salary was $1,500.

In 1819 Illinois was admitted into the Union, and the salary of the district judge was fixed at $1,000; in 1820 Alabama was admitted with a district judge's salary of $1,500; in 1822 Missouri came in with a salary for the district judge of $1,200.

In 1830 there seems to have been a general revision of the salaries of the district judges by Congress, and in that revision I find that the district judges in the States of Massachusetts, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and the eastern district of Pennsylvania were fixed at $2,500; in North Carolina at $2,000; in Maine at $1,800; in Rhode Island at $1,500; in Delaware at $1,500, being as I before remarked a reduction of $100 from the salary of the judge of that district; in Maryland $2,000; in New Jersey $2,500; in Vermont $1,200; in the western district of Pennsylvania $1,800.

In 1836 Arkansas was admitted into the Union, and the district judge of that State had his salary fixed at $2,000. In the same year Michigan was admitted, and the salary of the judge there was put at $1,500. Texas was admitted in 1845, and the salary there was $2,000, and Wisconsin in 1846, and the salary was $1,500.

Again, in 1855 there seems to have been a kind of general revision of the subject of the salaries of the district judges, with this result: In Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware, New Jersey, Iowa, and Wisconsin the salary was fixed at $2,000 each; in the northern district of Florida it was fixed at $2,250; in the western district of Virginia, in North Carolina, in the eastern and western districts of Tennessee, in the northern and southern districts of Mississippi, in the western district of Pennsylvania, in the western district of Louisiana, in Texas, in Kentucky, in Ohio, in Indiana, in Missouri, in the eastern and western districts of Arkansas, in Illinois, and in Michigan the salary was put at $2,500 each. In Georgia by this same act of 1855, in South Carolina, in the eastern district of Virginia, in the northern district of New York, and the northern and southern districts of Alabama, the salaries were put at $2,750; in Maryland, Massachusetts, the eastern district of Pennsylvania, the southern district of Florida, and the southern district of California at $3,000; the eastern district of Louisiana at $3,500; the southern district of New York at $3,750; and the northern district of California at $5,000.

In 1857 the salary of the district judge of the northern district of Illinois was made $3,500; in the district of Wisconsin it was made $2,500, and in Michigan $3,000. In 1864 the salary of the district judge of the northern district of New York was made $3,500. In 1865 the salary of the district judge of Nevada was fixed at $3,500. In 1867 the salary of the California judge was fixed again at $5,000, the eastern district of Louisiana at $4,500; Massachusetts, the northern and southern and eastern districts of New York, and the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania, Maryland, the northern district of Illinois, the southern district of Ohio, and New Jersey, at $4,000; and all the other districts at $3,500.

The present salaries of these judges is fixed by section 554 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 554. District judges are entitled to receive yearly salaries at the following rates, payable quarterly from the Treasury: The judge of the district of California, $5,000; the judge of the district of Louisiana, $4,500; the judges of the district of Massachusetts; the northern, southern, and eastern districts of New York; the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania; the district of New Jersey; the district of Maryland; the southern district of Ohio, and the northern district of Illinois, $4,000. The judges of all other districts, $3,500. No other allowance or payment shall be made to them for travel, expenses, or otherwise.

It will be observed on looking at these salaries that Congress in each one of the acts which have heretofore been passed has discriminated in the salaries of the several district judges. This is the first bill that was ever introduced which ignored the difference between the several districts and undertook to have a uniform salary throughout the United States. The former acts to which I have called attention, especially the earlier ones, seem to have been framed upon a careful consideration of all the elements which ought to be taken into consideration in fixing the salaries of judges.

And here let me remark, Mr. President, that it is not the sole or even the most important element in fixing the salary of a judge to determine as to what may be the abstract value of his services. Uniformly up to now the salaries have been regulated with reference to professional gains in the States in which the appointments were made, with reference to the cost of living in the several States in which the judges resided, and by taking into consideration all these things and another one to which I will allude presently, the Congress has up to now fixed a satisfactory adjustment of these salaries.

The other consideration to which I allude is this: that up to now Congress in fixing the salaries of the district judges has had some reference to the salaries paid by the States in which the judges discharge their duties to their own judicial officers. It has not, up to this time, been the policy of Congress to give to its judicial officers performing local duties inside of the States an invidious advantage over the judicial officers of the States in whose jurisdiction they perform their duties.

I have a list of the salaries paid by the several States of this Union, not to their inferior judges—I could not get that—but to their highest judicial officers, and by a comparison of that list, which I shall read to the Senate directly, it will be seen that to these inferior—because that is the term by which they are designated in the Constitution—judicial officers of the Government of the United States this bill proposes to give a salary larger than is given in a large majority of the States of this Union to their highest judicial officers. I have made no comparison between similar officers in the States to these—the circuit and district judges who perform nisi prius duties. I have had no means of ascertaining what is the salary paid to those officers in the States, but I have taken the highest judicial officers of the States, the supreme judges, and I find that in only six States is the salary paid to the highest judicial officer higher than is proposed by this bill to be paid to inferior Federal officers. In New York the salary is $7,000, with $2,000 for expenses; in Pennsylvania it is $8,000; in New Jersey it is $7,000; in Nevada it is $6,000; in California it is $6,000; in Massachusetts it is $6,000. These six States are the only States which pay their highest judges a salary greater than is allowed by this bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Allow me to say that the judges of the supreme court in the State of Wisconsin receive a salary, the chief-justice and the associate justices, of $5,000 a year. The act increasing their salary was only passed a few years ago, so that the Senator may have overlooked that fact.

Mr. GEORGE. So far as the State judges are concerned I have obtained my figures from the American Almanac, prepared by Mr. Spofford, the Librarian. I am willing to be corrected in reference to Wisconsin; but there are yet only six States which pay their highest judges a larger salary than is proposed to be paid by this bill to the inferior judges of the United States.

I find that there are only six of the States which pay their supreme judges a salary equal to the salary proposed by this bill. They are Colorado, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, Wisconsin, and Ohio; and Ohio's law does not go into operation as to the present incumbents, only as to future incumbents; an idea which sustains the proposition contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. There is also support for that amendment in the effort made by Mr. Madison in the convention which framed the Constitution to have inserted in that clause which prohibits the diminution of the salaries of the judges during their continuance in office the further provision that they should not be increased.

I go on. In Missouri the salary of the supreme judges is $4,500.

Mr. FARLEY. Allow me a moment.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. In the State of California the judges of the courts of the State, their salaries being fixed when they enter on the duties of the office, can not be increased or diminished during their term.

Mr. GEORGE. That is in accordance with Mr. Madison's idea. That seems to be the idea embraced in the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Now, Mr. President, I go on further, because I want all these statistics to be laid before the Senate and before the country, however dreary they may be. In Missouri the salary of the supreme judges is $4,500; in Connecticut, Rhode Island, Michigan, Minnesota, Indiana, and Iowa the salary is $4,000; less than the amount proposed to be paid by this bill to the judges of the inferior courts of the United States sitting in the same State and administering a part of the same jurisdiction as the State supreme judges do. Maryland, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Texas pay their supreme judges $3,500; $1,500 less than is proposed by this bill to be paid to the inferior judge of the United States district court who holds his court within the limits of the State. In Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Maine, Virginia, and Kansas the salary of the supreme judges is $3,000; in New Hampshire it is $2,700; in Georgia, Nebraska, Vermont, and North Carolina it is $2,500; in West Virginia, $2,250; in Oregon, $2,000; and in Delaware, $2,000.

A recapitulation of this will show that there are three States that pay a salary of over $6,000, four which pay a salary of $6,000, seven which pay a salary of $5,000, one of $4,500, seven of $4,000, four of $3,500, six of $3,000, one of $2,700, four of $2,500—just one-half of the amount to be paid under this bill to this inferior judge of the United States; one of $2,250, and two of $2,000.

But, Mr. President, that is not all the difference; it lacks a great deal of being all the difference in favor of the Federal judge against the State judge. The difference of tenure is great. I find in looking over the tenure of the judges of the supreme courts of the various States that they range about six and twelve years. One State has twenty-one, Pennsylvania; in New York it is fourteen years, and in New Jersey seven, but all of them have limited terms, very few going over nine years, some of them going as low as two years, as in Vermont; and one, a very remarkable tenure, in Rhode Island, where they hold their office until a joint resolution shall pass both houses of the Legislature removing them from office or asking them to resign.

These Federal officers have the advantage in tenure, and it is a very great advantage that they have security in their position. They are appointed during good behavior, which is tantamount to an appointment for life. That seems to be the practice of the Government, though from the little reflection I have given to that subject I am satisfied that there is a mode, if adopted, by which they can be got rid of without impeachment when they become inefficient. That is not all, Mr. President; when one of these inferior judges has served ten years and arrived at the age of 70 he can resign his place and draw his salary for the rest of his life. That is the law; but in practice, owing to the difficulty of getting them out of their places, if one of them becomes inefficient before he reaches the age of 70 years and before he has served ten years he will be invited or authorized to resign his place by an act of Congress giving him his salary to the end of his term, as was done in the case of Judge Hunt. I believe that is the only case, but if is the precedent set, and it will be followed whenever and wherever one of these judges, before the expiration of his tenure of service and before his arrival at the age of 70, shall become disqualified in any way to discharge the duties of his office. There is no reason why it should not be done in a case of that sort the same as it was done in the case of Judge Hunt; and so, sir, I may say that it is the accepted doctrine that a Federal judge may resign his place under the authority of a special act of Congress at any time that his health will not permit him to discharge the duties of his office and draw the salary to the end of his life. No such privilege is allowed to any State judge.

Mr. President, the States are as important agencies of the people in the administration of their governmental affairs as the Federal Government. Within their keeping, within their jurisdiction, lies the great mass of powers which protect life, liberty, and property. In fact, the two sets of governments, the State government and the United States Government, are but agencies of the people to have their governmental business done. There is no preference to be given to one over the other. The dignity and importance of the State governments should not be lessened or diminished by any act of ours.

What is the effect of this? You put an inferior Federal judge in a State, you give him a salary twice as large in some instances and in many instances much larger than is given by the State to the judges of her highest tribunal; and what is the effect? You enter into a competition on the part of the Federal Government with the State to purchase from the State service, to seduce from the State service by these higher salaries, the services of her best sons. I do not believe we ought to do anything of that sort. I do not believe that we ought to send an inferior judge into a State with a salary larger than is allowed to the highest judge in that State. Such a practice as that augments unduly the powers and importance of the Federal Government, and it depresses the powers and importance of the State governments.

But, Mr. President, there is no necessity for passing this bill. Does any Senator say—will he rise in his place and say that the present salaries have been unable to secure competent and faithful and able men in the service of the United States in the district courts? Is there any public reason—not a private reason to accommodate a particular judge—but is there any public reason based upon considerations of public policy and of the efficiency of the public service which demands the passage of this bill? If there be an exception in any particular State, as I admit there may be, I am willing to meet that demand as to that particular State.

It was said yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] who addressed the Senate that for every vacancy that occurred in one of these district judgeships there were at least forty applicants. I suppose he is correct. But I deny the proposition as founded in reason or the experience of this country that high salaries necessarily produce or procure a more efficient service than moderate salaries. Judge Story served upon the Supreme Bench of the United States for a long time at $3,500 and for another long time at $4,500, and we have produced no abler man than he. Marshall, the greatest judge that ever sat, I suppose, in the Supreme Court of the United States, served most of his time with a bench whose salaries were $3,500. It does not follow that high prices get the best material.

How are these judges selected? Will the gentleman say that the President of the United States in making a selection for a district judge goes among the bar of a State and asks the best-qualified man to accept the office? No, sir; we know that such a statement would be untrue. He selects from his own party alone and never considers the qualifications or the claims for the position of any one outside of it. Has any Democrat been appointed to a judicial office since the close of the war—I was about to say since the advent of the Republican party? I know in my own State under the present rule of selecting judges that the President confining himself to his own party would not have a chance by a great deal of getting the best legal or judicial talent of the State. I make no complaint against the present district judge there; he is a good man and a fair lawyer; an impartial, upright, and non-partisan judge; but I am discussing the question now of the efficiency of high salaries to procure the best talent and the best judge. I believe that its tendency would be directly the reverse. You make these offices the objects of greed, make them the aim of avarice, and you bring them almost necessarily within the reach of the most unscrupulous party man who seeks the place.

We have had a little experience in some of the States in reference to high salaries upon the advent of governments which were formed there in 1868 and 1869 under the reconstruction laws of Congress. The very first thing that was done was to raise enormously all official salaries beyond what they had ever been before, and the result was that in the judiciary at least there never was a more incompetent set of men put upon any people whatever. I believe they went so far as to appoint a doctor as a chancellor in Mississippi who had not even been licensed to practice law, because they could not find, I suppose, a man any better qualified within the circle out of which they had determined to make their appointments.

So, Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill. I think it is full of evil. I think it is an unnecessary waste of the people's money. I think it will do no good. It will overpay in many instances a class of men who are better off now than they ever were before in the places which they have.

For these reasons I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to present a memorial at this time, signed by members of the Kanawha bar, asking for an increase to $5,000 of the salary of the judge of the United States district court for the district of West Virginia. As the bill has been reported by the committee and is now before the Senate, I ask to have this memorial inserted in the RECORD as if read. It does not embrace a dozen lines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia asks that a memorial relating to the bill before the Senate be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

We, the undersigned, members of the Kanawha bar, do respectfully request that the salary of the judge of the United States district court for the district of West Virginia be increased so that the same will amount to the sum of $5,000 per annum.

Charleston, W. Va., March 15, 1884.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question. The Senator has presented some very interesting figures showing the amount of salary of the district judges at different times. I may have failed to understand the logic of those figures. I ask whether he condemns the acts of Congress which have raised the salaries of district judges from time to time as the country has grown, as the wages of labor have increased, or whether he is now in favor of reducing all the salaries of district judges to the original amount fixed by law, say $1,000 or $1,500 or $2,000 each?

Mr. GEORGE. I am in favor of the salaries remaining exactly where they are, except in some particular case it can be shown that the salary is not sufficient. I presented these figures for the purpose of showing what had been the legislation of this country on that subject, and especially to show that up to this time there never had been a proposition to make the salaries of the district judges in all the States equal; that in every single act ever passed by Congress there had been discriminations.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, a reason has been advanced why the bill now under consideration should not be passed which I do not consider sound. It has been suggested that all the district judges sought and accepted their offices knowing what salary was provided by law, and therefore are not entitled to an increase of compensation. I will answer the suggestion by saying that they also took their offices knowing that it was within the power of the Government to increase their salaries whenever the difference in values, whenever the cost of living, or whenever the amount of business which the courts were required to transact made such an increase of salary just and reasonable.

I thank the Senator from Mississippi for the figures he has given us this morning. I think they conclusively show that Congress has from time to time, as the circumstances and conditions of the country appeared to require it, made a just and proper increase in the salaries of the Federal judges, and I, for one, think the time has now arrived when there should be a further increase.

The truth is that when the salaries of Federal judges were fixed at $1,000 per annum and upward wages of common laborers were 25 cents a day and $6 a month, or less. Even as late as 1860 I think $3,500 was equivalent for the purposes of supporting and educating a family to $7,000 now.

It has been suggested that if the present district judges should resign their offices there would be numerous applicants from every district for the positions thus made vacant. That may be true, and I presume to assert that if the compensation of every officer of this Government, from the Chief Executive of the nation to the clerk in one of the Departments who receives $50 a month, was reduced by law at once one-half, there would still be found a sufficient number of persons who would be willing to sacrifice themselves for their country and who would assume the duties and take the compensation attached to those places. But I doubt whether any Senator would claim that it would be either economical or right to compel the present incumbents of the various offices in the Departments to resign their positions by reducing their compensation and to put into their places incompetent and inexperienced men to transact the business of the Government.

I have a case in my mind which fairly illustrates the propriety and justice of this bill. Upon the admission of the State of Oregon into the Union a judge of the Territorial court was appointed district judge of the United States for the district of Oregon at a salary of $3,500 a year. During the war and afterward he received his salary in currency worth at different times, say, 40, 60, 70, and 90 cents on the dollar. I know that his salary has been and is inadequate compensation for the services performed by him. So far as the contrast which has been made between his salary and the salaries paid the judges of the supreme court of the State is concerned, I will say that the salaries paid the State judges are grossly inadequate; but I think there is no question but that the labor which is devolved upon the judge of the district court in Oregon is greater than the labor which is performed by the judges of the State courts. The district and circuit courts of Oregon—the latter being for the most part held by the district judge—are open I may say the year round; and the entire time of the judge is necessarily devoted to the business of his office.

While there might be men in that State and elsewhere who would be willing to take the office and perform the duties for the compensation the judge now receives, it would be in my judgment a great loss to the country if he were compelled to resign that position on account of the inadequacy of his compensation. The Government would lose the experience of a quarter of a century upon the bench—the services of a judge who by reason of his long service is familiar with the laws and judicial decisions of the State of Oregon and of the United States.

If there ever was a time when this country needs a learned, fearless, and independent Federal judiciary, that time is now; and nothing more is needed to enforce this assertion than the remarks which we have listened to on this floor this morning and within the last few days.

Why, sir, we spend days and even weeks discussing the constitutionality of matters very trivial in themselves. A resolution to expend $25,000 was discussed here day after day as to its constitutionality, and our Federal courts are constantly called upon to determine nice questions of jurisdiction, nice constitutional questions as to the powers of Congress and the powers of the several States.

The district courts have jurisdiction of the laws for the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors. They have civil jurisdiction and equity jurisdiction in various cases; they have jurisdiction of admiralty and prize cases, and the district judges are authorized to hold circuit courts in the various districts.

The duties of these courts are constantly increasing; the field of Congressional legislation is constantly widening. We have scarcely entered upon one extended field of legislation, the regulation of commerce under the power of Congress to legislate in regard to interstate commerce. Within the last few years railroads have been greatly extended, great corporations have been multiplied, and the United States courts have been called upon to decide important questions important not alone on account of the amount involved, but important on account of the questions involved. Our commerce has increased within the last ten years something like 60 per cent., and under the power of Congress to regulate commerce all the laws upon the subject are to be construed and enforced by our Federal judiciary.

For one I am in favor of securing the best obtainable material for Federal judges by paying adequate compensation for the services required.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill:

Provided, That this act shall apply only to judges that shall be hereafter appointed.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, there are a few statements I desire to place before the Senate and the country on this subject by one of the wisest men who ever lived in this country; I allude now to Dr. Franklin:

Sir, there are two passions which have a powerful influence in the affairs of men. These are ambition and avarice—the love of power and the love of money. Separately each of these has great force in prompting men to action; but when united in view of the same object they have in many minds the most violent effects. Place before the eyes of such men a post of honor that shall at the same time be a place of profit, and they will move heaven and earth to obtain it. The vast number of such places it is that renders the British Government so tempestuous. The struggles for them are the true source of all those factions which are perpetually dividing the nation, distracting its councils, hurrying it sometimes into fruitless and mischievous wars, and often compelling a submission to dishonorable terms of peace.

Now I will read another short extract from the same speech:

Sir, though we may set out in the beginning with moderate salaries—

As we did—

we shall find that such will not be of long continuance. Reasons will never be wanting for proposed augmentations; and there will always be a party for giving more to the rulers, that the rulers may be able in return to give more to them. Hence, as all history informs us, there has been in every state and kingdom a constant kind of warfare between the governing and the governed; the one striving to obtain more for its support and the other to pay less.

I recognize that that warfare is on us, and I enlist on the other side in this case.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I shall vote for the committee's bill and vote against any amendment, and I shall do it for this reason: I think the salary reported by the committee's bill is even insufficient to secure that kind and order of talent which is necessary to make a good judge. It requires for that purpose a man of judicial mind; and a man who can not earn more than the sum here provided in any other kind of business, especially in the legal profession, is entirely unfit by reason of his training and acquirements to act as judge of any court.

It is very true that there are some other factors that are to be considered, but a judge of a United States court can not subsist on honor alone. Some other substantial meed is necessary to enable him to live as other men live. In my own State we have the case of Judge Nixon, one of the most able and distinguished men upon the bench, who really gives more hours during the year to the duties of his position than is given by any judge in our State courts. He receives the small salary of $4,000 per year, while our State circuit court judges receive from seven to eight thousand dollars.

I say it is entirely unjust to require of Judge Nixon, or any man of his ability and his attainments and of his success as a judge, to work for the sum of $4,000.

It is true, as some Senators have said, that if the judges dislike to serve longer in that capacity for the salary given them they can resign from the bench; but that is not the way to get a good dispensation of law. It is not the way to give justice to the people who seek redress in the courts. I think it is wise to secure the highest order of talent and pay for it a price commensurate with its worth. I think we have illustrations enough of men of distinguished talent and success upon the bench who have been really required through stress of circumstances to surrender their position and resort to other means of occupation for livelihood, especially to the profession of the law. A man who is fit to be a judge of one of the United States courts for which we are here making provision can earn two or three times that amount in the practice of his profession.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I had nearly finished yesterday the remarks which I desired to make when the hour of 2 o'clock was reached, and I was cut off from presenting some views that I entertain about this question which I think are important and which will control my vote. Section 554 of the Revised Statutes is:

SEC. 554. District judges are entitled to receive yearly salaries at the following rates, payable quarterly from the Treasury: The judge of the district of California, $5,000; the judge of the district of Louisiana, $4,500; the judges of the district of Massachusetts; the northern, southern, and eastern districts of New York; the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania; the district of New Jersey; the district of Maryland; the southern district of Ohio; and the northern district of Illinois, $4,000. The judges of all other districts, $3,500. No other allowance or payment shall be made to them for travel, expenses, or otherwise.

We have observed the practice, and it has been found to be a good one, of applying to the different judges who might require larger salaries because of the labors of their office and because of their places of residence, and giving them more to live upon. It is now proposed to raise the salaries of all the judges of the district courts in this country to $5,000 a year. I remarked yesterday that if that was done the judges of the Territorial courts ought also to have $5,000. They get $3,000 now. They have as much work to do, and of as important a character, or rather of a more important character, than the average of the district judges of the United States.

When we have raised this salary, as I understand it we shall not hereafter be able to reduce it during the lives of any of the incumbents. That means forever. We fix it at $5,000 now, to remain that way under the Constitution always, beyond our power of ever being able to get back to it without discriminating against some judge who will be found upon the bench. The Constitution provides that—

The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

So that when we fix $5,000, it makes no difference how serious the mistake may be or how great a burden it may necessarily impose upon the country, we have got to stand by it; any judge can claim it against us as long as he lives. That makes the matter a little more serious than the first appearance of it, for this is not a repealable act; it is not one that may be got rid of when we may determine that it is based upon a bad policy. Therefore we had better pursue the system we have heretofore observed, of giving additional salaries only in those cases where it has been demonstrated by experience that the salaries at present are insufficient.

Gentlemen have edified the Senate upon the principles involved in giving large salaries to judicial officers. They say that a good, round, fat salary is necessary in order to maintain the dignity of the office and to obtain the proper grade of talent upon the bench; and then they argue, very illogically, ergo, having upon the bench a set of judges, it is necessary in order to improve their talents and respectability that we should give them more money. As to some of these judges, I grant you that if we could improve their talents or their respectability by voting them more money it would be a good thing to do; but I can not do that in justice to the people. We can not take money out of the Treasury for the purpose of plastering up abraded consciences, bad records, incompetent abilities, and a slouchy, miserable, mean service.

I should like to know if any Senator here can deceive himself or thinks that the country can be deceived by the proposition that we shall improve the character of the incumbents of the district court judgeships by increasing their salaries. Is that the way that we are going to spend the money of the people of the United States? We have got to that situation here now with this hundred millions of surplus money in the Treasury that we seem to be dazzled with it all the time. We have lost our composure, it seems to me, and our sense of justice to the people, because we happen to be not out of debt but we happen to have a sum of money that we can control for the present moment of time, amounting to about $100,000,000, in the Treasury.

While we are increasing the salaries of judges who took these offices at the present price, and who were glad to get them, the men who pay the money into the Treasury are afflicted with distress throughout the land to an extent that brings an outcry continually before the Senate. We find the country filled with strikes; no demand for labor. The man who is willing to go to his anvil or his plow or any other instrument of industry and toil day by day and thanks God for the opportunity of getting 75 cents or $1 for the chance to work for it, is forgotten entirely, it appears, by the Senate of the United States, and we are here lavishing money, raising salaries $1,500 a year, and for life at that, upon men who were willing and anxious and begging to get these offices when they were appointed to them.

Then they are to have it, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] reminds me, after they have left the service and after they are incompetent to serve the country any longer. I was speaking when I closed my remarks yesterday of the happy condition of a man who had himself provided for for life at a salary of $3,500 a year. Peace visits that man in all of his sleeping and in all of his waking hours. He has no cares about the future. He has only to observe a frugal and commendable economy for the purpose of keeping the expenditures of his family within the limits of a sum of money which he is bound to receive quarterly from the Government of the United States.

I maintain that a man who has a salary of $3,500 a year for life has a better estate in his hands, a better reliance for his family, than a man who holds a position for six years in the Senate of the United States at $5,000 a year, or in the other House for two years at $5,000, or as governor of a State, if you please, at $6,000, $7,000, or $8,000 a year. It is a very much more important matter to him to have it understood, in respect of all his future prospects in life, that he is to receive annually the sum of $3,500 than it would be to be able by running for some important office, or being elected or appointed to it, to get $5,000 or $10,000 for a few years during the era of the very maximum power of his manhood. We have got our United States bonds out. If we put them at thirty years or forty or fifty years' maturity, we can sell them for par in gold at 3 per cent. interest without any difficulty. If you shorten the time to five or to six years you may find difficulty in selling them at an interest of 4½ or even 5 per cent. Why is the difference? We understand it perfectly well. It is simply that the long tenure of the bond during which a man may keep his money invested in a permanent way adds advantage, security, safety, to it. Is there nothing of advantage in the fact that a man has a life tenure in a district court judgeship? I venture to say that the best paid men in the United States today, in comparison with the amount of labor they have to perform and the public responsibility they have to meet, are the district judges of the United States taking them one by one. It is proposed to give $5,000 to every judge of a district court in the United States who happens now to be the incumbent of one of these offices. We find that there is nothing to be gained by it but merely to increase his revenues; we find that he was satisfied with the present salary at the time he took the office and was delighted to get it; we find that he has been living, if he has been an honest and a frugal man, in accordance with his income and raising his family on it in a proper degree of fashionable luxury upon $3,500 a year. He can go and quietly settle himself down upon a little farm, if he chooses to do so. He can buy a little farm for the half of one year's salary; he can bring around him all the comforts of life that a moderate man ought to desire, and in peace and in quietude, retired from the strife and the battles of life, he can consider those questions of law which are brought to him by counsel learned in the law and argued before him. After all, the great thing in making a good judge is to be an honest man. Any well-instructed and fair-minded man who has a sound conscience and a clean heart can make a good judge. If he has able lawyers to present the questions of law on either side to him, his task is a comparatively light one.

I am not arguing against giving proper salaries to the judicial officers of this country; but I am arguing against the principle which is invoked here, that men who have taken their offices for life upon a certain stipulated salary shall now have their salary raised when they do not bring to the satisfaction of the Senate or of the country evidence of having a higher range of abilities than they had when they took the offices or evidence of having earned from the Treasury of the United States this increased compensation, which after we have made it we can never revoke.

This is no light and trifling matter. When we place this statute upon the books it will run along through the years, and there will never be found a Congress that can repeal it. It may have one good effect. It may have the effect hereafter of preventing us from creating some new districts that are sought to be created and are looked after with great eagerness in different parts of the United States. It may have that effect; but that is the only line of light or of justice that shines through this bill. It is a bill of extreme and permanent injustice to the people of the United States. We inflict upon them a burden of $1,500 additional pay in favor of every district judge in the United States for all time to come. I am not willing to participate in shouldering that burden down upon my people. Gentlemen who feel more liberal than I do in this respect, especially the Senator from New Jersey, who lives in a rich manufacturing community, probably can see their way through. His judge gets already $4,000 a year. He is complaining that he does not get enough. Perhaps that Senator has some reason for desiring to see this Treasury emptied anyhow. There are Senators here who desire to see the Treasury, when filled up, emptied upon appropriations continually. My judgment is that their real foundation reason for it is that it gives them a better chance to tax the people——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I wish we might have unanimous consent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] has addressed the Chair.

Mr. MORGAN. I object. Let the bill go over. We have not thought about it enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I rose to ask unanimous consent that the judicial salary bill might be proceeded with, so that the Senator from Alabama may finish his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Alabama be permitted to continue his remarks upon the judicial salary bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not ask to go on to-day, sir. Gentlemen are very kind indeed, and I thank them very profoundly.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not want to talk the bill to death, of course.

Mr. MORGAN. I am a little hoarse, and do not care to speak to-day. I would rather speak to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR I believe the Senator is the only member who does not desire to have his remarks finished.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1692) to limit the cost of indexing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

MIANTONOMOH CONTRACTS.

Mr. McPHERSON. Before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the unfinished business I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to agree to lay it aside informally for a moment. I wish to submit a resolution asking for some information from the Navy Department, and as the naval appropriation bill will come before us in a few days, I desire to obtain the information before that reaches us.

Mr. BLAIR. It will take no time?

Mr. McPHERSON. No, sir; no time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to offer at this time a resolution. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of the contract or contracts between the Navy Department and Messrs. Cammell & Co., of Sheffield, England, and John Brown & Co., of Sheffield, England, or with any other parties, for the turrets, or material for the same, for the ironclad Miantonomoh.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present reception and consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Why not include in it any other contract in regard to the same thing, so that we may have the whole matter?

Mr. McPHERSON. It is there. It reads: "Or with any other parties." I think the resolution is broad enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present reception and consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLAIR. I shall object if it is likely to lead to debate.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think there is no objection to it. There can be no objection to such a resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

STATEN ISLAND SOUND BRIDGES.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me one moment longer to make a transfer of a petition sent to the wrong committee.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand the Senator distinctly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to have a petition that I sent by mistake to the Committee on Railroads a day or two since transferred to the Committee on Commerce, who are considering the matter.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection, of course.

Mr. McPHERSON. It is the petition of citizens of New Jersey and New York, praying for the passage of a bill authorizing the construction of bridges across Staten Island Sound, which by mistake was referred to the Committee on Railroads. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce instead, as they are considering the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that yesterday the petition was reported back from the Committee on Railroads by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER], and that it was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McPHERSON. All right.

MEAT EXPORTATIONS.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from New Hampshire is kind enough to yield to me for a moment. The Committee on Foreign Relations reported a resolution which was referred to the Committee on Printing. They are anxious to have their report and accompanying documents concerning the export of meats published as soon as possible. The Committee on Printing reports it favorably.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to make a report at this time from the Committee on Printing. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The resolution reported will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. MILLER, of California:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 6,000 extra copies of the report and accompanying documents of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate upon the resolution of the Senate requiring said committee "to inquire into and report such legislation as shall protect our interests against those governments which have prohibited or restrained the importation of meats from the United States;" 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. INGALLS.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, last evening at the adjournment I had very nearly concluded what I then proposed to say upon this bill. This morning I shall occupy only a few moments in placing some matters before the Senate which are suggested by the fact that there seemed to be upon this side of the Chamber some doubt arising as to whether the principle involved in the appropriation was not a new and unheard-of principle to the Republican party.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Before the Senator proceeds to debate that branch of the case, there are one or two points in regard to the matters he has previously discussed to which I should like to call his attention and on which I wish to hear some suggestion from him. I have read carefully the Senator's speech made on the first day of the consideration of this bill, and I do not think he is as clear upon one or two points as he would himself like to be. I wish to call his attention to one of the strong points made in his first speech and to which he alluded in a measure yesterday. It may not in a broad view be considered very material; but one of the strong points in his speech and in his position was that the benefit to be derived from this appropriation was the education of the illiterate children, and that in some portions of the country there are colored children who are very illiterate, and therefore the result of the bill would be to aid very much towards their education. I fail to discover in the Senator's speech and I fail to discover in the Senator's bill any sort of guarantee that this great bounty will reach a portion of the class which he wishes this bounty to reach. I see no guarantee in his bill on that matter. I ask him the question because I may have overlooked it; and I call his attention to the point whether the bill itself furnishes any guarantee to Congress or to the people who will have to pay this taxation that that portion of the illiterates of the American people will have the benefit which he thinks will go to them? Is there any guarantee that that will be done?

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that there is. The bill distributes the money irrespective of race or color entirely. It distributes the money to the several States upon the basis of illiteracy, whether it is white or black or Indian or what not, existing within the State, as reported by the official returns of the census. The bill then expressly requires that the aid granted shall be applied within the State without distinction of race or color. It does not provide that the colored people shall have it in proportion to their illiteracy more than the others or less than the others. It simply provides that the amount distributed shall be given to each State upon the basis of illiteracy. It will be taken mainly by the States where most of the colored people live, as the Senator well understands, but the bill provides that when taken within the States it shall be distributed and used without any reference to color whatever, and in such a way as to equalize as far as may be the educational advantages of all classes, of all races, within the jurisdiction of the State. The bill is explicit in that regard.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Precisely; but that is a mere legislative declaration in the bill. Is there any guarantee of the execution of that provision of the bill? The money is to be placed, as I understand, in the hands of the States and is to be controlled by them. It is to be distributed among that class of population in a great many States to which we gave the elective franchise. We gave them the privilege to vote. That was a gift. Now you propose to give them millions of money to be distributed to educate children of this same race.

Mr. BLAIR. And the other.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly, and the other; both.

Mr. BLAIR. We do not refuse it to our own race.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Very well. The elective franchise was given to both; it was given to the whites and also to the blacks. The State governments were to administer the law; and notwithstanding our legislation gave the blacks the right to vote, and it was guaranteed in the acts we passed and it was supported and sustained by a constitutional amendment, yet there are gentlemen who will say on this floor and off it that that gift to that class of American people has never been enjoyed. I suppose my friend will agree with me in that statement.

Mr. BLAIR. I will agree with the Senator that Senators will say so, and I believe so to a very considerable extent.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That gift was declared by legislation, it was sustained by a constitutional enactment of the American people, and yet it failed to reach the object sought. Now it is proposed, as I understand the Senator, to give immense millions, for the purpose of the education of a portion of that same class, to the same channel that was to bestow the elective franchise on them, that is, the State governments. In order that nobody shall be deceived or misunderstand this matter I desire to know before the debate is closed that there shall be some sort of guarantee to that portion of the people whom this money is meant to reach and who are intended to be benefited by it.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know that $1,000,000 is any more "immense," given for this purpose, than any other. Although a million may seem more immense to the Senator from Nebraska when expended in this way than when expended in the way of improvements upon the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, undoubtedly the bill does call for a large amount of money.

Before replying to the Senator I wish to advert to the impression which seems to exist that money expended for education is a vastly greater amount of money than it is when expended for any other given purpose. We hear from time to time in the discussion of this bill about our expending $120,000,000, and it is lumped together as though the country was to be impressed with the idea that we were to expend it all in one year. We do not talk in that way when we are dealing with other bills and other forms of expenditure. If I were to reply to that in the same spirit in which the objection is advanced, I should talk about the expenditures for carrying on the Government as two or three billions during the same period. If we pay out even $100,000,000 or $120,000,000 ($105,000,000 is the exact amount that is covered by the bill), the distribution is to be extended over the next ten years. I suppose this country would be very thankful to get on with a river and harbor bill that would average $10,000,000 a year during the same time. Would there be anything atrocious in our expending as much to relieve ourselves from this great evil of illiteracy as in the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country during the next ten years? Would it on the whole be a less judicious expenditure of that amount of money? It is a question that well may be thought of by Senators who raise objections of this ephemeral and deceptive form, not designed, but which really do give a wrong impression in regard to the public burden which is to be imposed by the enactment of this bill into a law.

My friend the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], who proposed in the last Congress the expenditure of about $80,000,000 annually, might be told and his bill might be opposed on the ground that it would be appropriating $800,000,000 during the same period of time that this bill proposes an expenditure of $105,000,000. But would that be anything like a fair putting of the case? Are we to lump the expenditures of all time to come and oppose a bill of this description on that ground? If we are to do so, let us put alongside with it the parallel in regard to expenditures in other directions. After all, the expenditure for education, the most important of all objects of legislation, either State or national, the most pressing of any at the present time, will be found to be a very moderate and a very modest expenditure that is proposed by the bill. It is very modest as compared with the evil itself.

A word now in regard to the safeguard which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] suggests as perhaps wanting in this bill. He speaks of the political differences and the political difficulties which we have had in the past; that here is a race which for some reason, notwithstanding the constitutional guarantees and rights under the statute laws of the land, fails to be actually felt and counted at the ballot-box and to which the right of citizenship is practically denied. That Senator knows very well that if those men were enlightened they would have their rights. It is only because they are ignorant that they are feeble; it is only because they are ignorant that they lack power, for knowledge is power. Give to an unintelligent race, whether black or white, sufficient knowledge, and in due time it will acquire property, in due time it will acquire power, and it will be felt at the ballot-box. It will defend itself; it will then have the power to do it.

Let me say to my Republican friends, in view of the efforts by military interference to vindicate the right to the ballot at the point of the bayonet, and in view of the failure of those efforts and the practical abandonment of the voters in the South to the regulation and control of the State authorities, Senators on this side of the Chamber may well hesitate to assert that there is any other remedy left for the condition of things that they complain of in the South except the establishment of common schools and the increase of the individual power of the man who is entitled to suffrage by making him more intelligent.

If Senators on this side of the Chamber wish to discuss this as a political measure, I say that the only political sense for the Republican party to exercise in this matter is to give schools to the South. We believe in our principles; intelligence embraces those principles wherever it exists, as we think. Why then and how then can we possibly oppose the introduction of the very elements and conditions which are essential for us to apply in order that we may appeal successfully to the popular judgment? And having convinced the popular judgment among the masses who are to exercise that judgment, there will be sufficient force to vindicate their right to be heard at the ballot-box, and so to participate in the government of the country. There is no other way open. We have abandoned the South. What have we done to vindicate the ballot-box in the South since 1876? Not one thing that is of tangible and practical value to the colored population to which we gave the franchise but failed to give the common schools when we had control practically in the Southern States. That colored population is turned over, as we know, utterly, and must be forever, unless reached by the introduction of schools which will reach both races alike. It is given over wholly and totally; and it is a settled, fixed condition and status of that colored population at the South to-day that they are not voters, that they are not citizens as a rule. I believe that as thoroughly as the Senator from Nebraska, and speaking simply as a Republican politician, I assert that this measure should be enacted into a law for the purpose of spreading the principles of the Republican party and as the only possible way of doing it now and hereafter.

I was about to speak a little with reference to the suggestion made last night that there were doubts whether a bill of this kind could be advocated properly by this side of the Chamber, as though it was a new question, a doubtful thing yet to be considered. I desire to remind everybody that four successive Republican Presidents of the United States have most emphatically declared in their messages and in public addresses in favor of national aid of a substantial character to common schools. There is no measure whatever that can be brought before the American Congress to-day in which the great general of our armies, ex-President Grant, feels as I believe so deep, so strong an interest as he does in the success of this or kindred measures which shall look to the elevation by national means of the people of the South. I do not limit his sympathies to either race, for they extend to all races there and everywhere. We know, too, that in the inaugural addresses and in the messages of President Hayes, and in his frequent public addresses since he ceased to be the Chief Magistrate of the country, he has strongly advocated precisely this measure in principle. The same is true of the present Chief Magistrate. I think in two of his messages, certainly in one, he very emphatically calls upon the American Congress to make liberal appropriations for the maintenance of the common schools throughout the country, especially in that region of the country where they are most required. Perhaps I ought not to go further and read from Republican platforms, and yet in the last Republican platform we did take this position:

The bill certainly is not in contradiction to the Republican platform in that respect. I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the bill and to the platform so far as this point is concerned—

The work of popular education is one left to the care of the several States, but it is the duty of the National Government to aid that work to the extent of its constitutional power. The intelligence of the nation—

I ask attention to this proposition—

The intelligence of the nation is but the aggregate of the intelligence in the several States, and the destiny of the nation must be guided not by the genius of any one State, but by the aggregate genius of all.

As we live in modern times, and four years ago may belong to ancient history, I will call the attention of my friends on this side of the Chamber to the precise language in which they are now appealing to the people of the United States for their suffrages in the ensuing Presidential contest through their national committee. I read from the call of the national committee as adopted in the call of the Republican State convention of Maine to choose delegates to Chicago the ensuing national convention:

Without regard to past political differences, who are in favor of elevating and dignifying American labor—

I remind Senators that there is a bill here for the establishment of a bureau of labor statistics also—protecting and extending home industries, giving free popular education to the masses of the people, securing free suffrage and an honest counting of ballots.

Divers and sundry other equally good propositions are embraced in the call, whereon we appeal to the masses of the American people for the support of our nominees who shall be named at the convention soon to be held. I might go further in this direction, for I do not consider that in advocating this bill I am exactly an outlaw from the Republican party. That remains to be seen; and I suggest that Republican Senators look over the record and consider the attitude of the party and of the American people so far as that people is included within the ranks of the Republican party as to the previous record of that party upon this great question.

I read in conclusion from the report, I understand a unanimous report, of the House Committee on Education in favor of a bill pending upon the Calendar of the House at the present session. The report is submitted by Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that it is not in order to read the reports of a committee of the other House of this session.

Mr. BLAIR. I will read an extract from President Garfield's inaugural address, March 4, 1881.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I will withdraw what I said in regard to the report of the House committee. President Garfield said:

But the danger which arises from ignorance in the voter can not be denied. It covers a field far wider than that of negro suffrage and the present condition of the race. It is a danger that lurks and hides in the sources and fountains of power in every State. We have no standard by which to measure the disaster that may be brought upon us by ignorance and vice in the citizen when joined to corruption and fraud in the suffrage.

The voters of the Union who make and unmake constitutions, and upon whose will hangs the destinies of our governments, can transmit their supreme authority to no successors save the coming generation of voters, who are the sole heirs of sovereign power. If that generation comes to its inheritance blinded by ignorance and corrupted by vice, the fall of the Republic will be certain and remediless.

The census has already sounded the alarm in the appalling figures which mark how dangerously high the tide of illiteracy has risen among our voters and their children.

To the South this question is of supreme importance, but the responsibility for the existence of slavery did not rest upon the South alone. The nation itself is responsible for the extension of the suffrage, and is under special obligations to aid in removing the illiteracy which it has added to the voting population. For the North and South alike there is but one remedy. All the constitutional power of the nation and of the States and all the volunteer forces of the people should be summoned to meet this danger by the strong influence of universal education.

This administration commenced with that declaration in the inaugural of the dead. It remains a question whether this administration is to redeem that pledge. One Congress is over; it has not yet been done; and I ask my Republican associates to reflect well upon what they are doing ere we decide finally and conclusively that the pledge shall not be redeemed.

I may add in conclusion that what may be termed the operating machinery of the bill is taken from one which has more than once passed the Senate, known as the Morrill bill. In the last Congress when it was acted upon the vote stood 41 yeas and only 6 in the negative. The Republican party is committed absolutely to the machinery and to the principle; and that machinery has been adopted in the pending measure very largely, so far as I am concerned, in view of the consideration that division might arise on this side of the Chamber if another and a more vigorous method of national interference were provided in the terms of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. VEST. What is that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 13, after the word "children," it is proposed to strike out "of the school age mentioned hereafter" and insert "between the ages of 5 and 21 years;" so as to read:

Which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children between the ages of 5 and 21 years living in the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I move, in line 10 of section 8, to strike out the words "at least one-third of the sum" and insert the words "an amount at least equal to the sum."

Mr. INGALLS. The words "equal to" have already been inserted.

Mr. PLUMB. The purpose of my amendment is that the States who receive this money shall pay as much out of their own treasury as they receive from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. INGALLS. Strike out the word "one-third" and it will accomplish it.

Mr. PLUMB. I was not aware of the previous amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read as modified.

The SECRETARY. In line 10 of section 8, after the word "schools," it is moved to strike out "at least one-third" and insert "an amount equal to."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I suppose there will be no objection to that.

Mr. BLAIR. Let us see how it is. My attention was distracted. The amendment as proposed by the Senator is very objectionable to my view.

Mr. PLUMB. The amendment is simply that any State receiving this money shall pay at least as much for the education of the children in its own limits as it receives from the Federal Government.

Mr. BLAIR. This is proposed in that innocent and unbusinesslike way which makes it seem as though it ought to be assented to; but, after all, it is one of the most vital and troublesome amendments the Senator could have suggested to the practical operation of this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I am sorry to trouble the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no doubt it is a source of great grief to my friend to have suggested anything in any way troublesome to me; and I assure him he has not as yet, because the suggestion is not as yet an accomplished fact. If it becomes so, it will be the act of the Senate and not of the Senator, and, of course, I shall acquiesce; but I should like to be heard upon the amendment if the Senator urges it.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator has the privilege of making any remarks.

Mr. BLAIR. I know the Senator would like to hear me speak, and that is one reason that induces me to insist on being heard before voting on the amendment. If the Senator has any reason to offer for his amendment, I should be glad to hear it before replying; if not, I will reply in advance to show wherein the amendment, as it seems to me, might be quite hurtful.

Under the operation of this bill there will be given the first year more than at any subsequent period to each State, and the first year every State which is specially benefited will be less able to bear taxation than at any subsequent year, assuming that the natural course of prosperity now arising shall continue. The bill will divide $15,000,000 the first year, giving, for instance, to the State of Alabama between eleven and twelve hundred thousand dollars. It is now struggling to raise between five and six hundred thousand dollars for this purpose. If now within that State we are to compel them to double their school taxation, raise two dollars where they now raise one before they obtain any benefits under this bill, it is a hardship with which they can not comply, and the result must be that for several years Alabama would receive no benefit whatever under the operation of the law, and it might, so far as Alabama is concerned, as well not be enacted at all. What is true in this illustration is true, of course, all the way through.

I shall not object if it is thought best to increase the amount to be first raised in the States to one-half the sum they receive under the operation of the bill; but to make it equivalent, equal to the amount conveyed to each State by the bill, would be very destructive to the purpose of this measure.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I think there is nothing unfair about this proposition, and I think something of this kind will be necessary in order to put upon the States the obligation to do that which they ought to do to accomplish the purpose which it is said is in view in the presentation and passage of this bill. I am greatly in hopes, however, that the bill will not pass in any shape. If it shall pass, it ought to so pass as to give some reasonable guarantee that it will perform some one of the objects proposed to be accomplished by it. In its present shape my objection is that it will result in destroying the entire school system of the Southern States so far as that school system depends upon voluntary effort with reference to taxation or any kind of local support, and will result in the adoption by the General Government of the functions of schoolmaster and tax-payer, completely to the exclusion of every effort on the part of the States. That result will also extend in my judgment measurably to all the States alike if this system shall be carried on for the term of years provided for in the bill.

I know, Mr. President, that when anything is said to be in behalf of education it is perhaps evidence of temerity that any one should oppose it. I have the honor to represent in part here a State which has done more for education in proportion to its means, as I believe, than any other State in the Union, certainly as much as any, and with as happy results both with reference to the degree of illiteracy among the people and with reference to the pecuniary results to be derived from the maintenance of a sound, comprehensive, and liberal system of common schools; and I do not believe that that system has been benefited to any perceptible degree by the largess of the General Government, which was maintained here yesterday by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. In fact, that largess is of very small account even in a pecuniary way. It rendered some service in the infant days of Kansas, when the people were substantially without taxable property; but I do not believe that now it adds in any perceptible degree to the value of the school system of that State, and I believe it might be removed without in any way affecting the efficiency of that system or adding to its burden.

Mr. President, I believe that every State of the Union, certainly every one of the older States, is able to pay for all the schooling that persons within its limits need. It does not cost any more to educate a person 10 years old or 20 years old to the point of being able to read or write than it does to teach one 5 years old. The number of persons within the school-year limit is not greater in the Southern States in proportion to the population than it is in the Northern States, and the taxable valuation in the Southern States is as great as it is in the agricultural States of the North in proportion to population.

I have here the tables which the Senator from New Hampshire very kindly inserted in his speech of the day before yesterday, and I take for the purpose of my comparison the States of Kansas and Louisiana. As shown by the census of 1880 Kansas had at the date of that census a population of 996,096, with an assessed valuation of $160,891,689. The State of Louisiana had a population of 939,946 and an assessed valuation of $160,162,439, a difference between those two States in reference to taxable valuation of only about $700,000.

Louisiana, then, has just as much taxable property in proportion to its population as Kansas has, and by reason of its being an older State and values therefore more permanent, society perhaps better organized, it is in a better condition to respond to the demand made upon it by the school children of the State than Kansas; certainly it is as able to do it, at all events. But it is said there are more illiterate people down there than in Kansas. The answer to that is I think distinctly and unqualifiedly, in the first place, that it costs no more to educate to the point of learning to read and write a person at the age of 20 years or 10 years than it does one at the age of 5 years. There are required no more school room, no more teachers, no more books, no more of any of the appliances; and consequently Louisiana is just as able to provide all children within her limits with the advantages of common schools as the State of Kansas is.

But the State of Louisiana, for purposes of its own—which I do not here characterize at all or mention in any way to reflect upon that State—saw fit to appropriate in the year 1880 for school purposes, exclusive of buildings and incidentals, $450,000, while the State of Kansas that year appropriated $1,276,786; nearly three times as much.

Mr. HOAR. How much does Louisiana get under this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Nine hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HOAR. If it is not interrupting the Senator from Kansas I should like to ask whether there are any States that do not now expend as much as they would get under this bill?

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, yes; there are quite a number.

Mr. ALLISON. Louisiana gets $900,000 under this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not remember the amount. That marks the difference of opinion perhaps in the people of these two States with reference to the necessity for common-school education, the desirability of advancing perhaps in the degrees of that education; and that is one of those things that I do not wish to criticise, but only to state that unless Louisiana shall develop more disposition and determination with reference to the investment of the funds which shall be given her by the National Government than she has with reference to her own funds, there is no reason to suppose that the giving of the additional sum proposed by this bill would result in any substantial advantage whatever.

Take the State of Alabama——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before the Senator leaves that point I wish to know whether that includes money which the several parishes raise for educational purposes or whether it is confined to appropriations from the State treasury?

Mr. PLUMB. The sum is divided in this way: From State tax, $360,000; from local taxes, $94,000. I therefore suppose it embraced all sources of revenue for school purposes raised in that State.

Take the State of Alabama. The State of Alabama, according to the census of 1880, had 1,262,205 people. It had an assessed valuation of $122,867,228, nearly thirty-eight million less than the State of Kansas. Alabama paid for school purposes in 1880 $250,000; less than one-fifth the amount paid by the State of Kansas. Alabama is a State that is exceptionally rich in all the elements of natural wealth. It has, perhaps, more mileage of navigable waters than any other State in the Union. It is not only rich in agricultural land and in timber, but what is a great deal more to the purpose, it is rich in coal and in iron, and there is being developed in that State what I believe will be some of these days the greatest mechanical industry of the United States. The wealth is there now in its natural state and is being rapidly put in a shape to be realized upon. And yet the State of Alabama paid only $250,000 for school purposes in 1880, while the people of Kansas paid $1,276,000 from about the same taxable valuation.

If this is a matter which is to be commended to the General Government on behalf of the States, why do not these States manifest their disposition in favor of education by appropriating money in proportion as other States appropriate money for that purpose? It does not do for them to come here and say they are not able to do this until they have done all they are able to do. If my theory is incorrect and it does take more money to educate a person of 20 years than a child of 5 and therefore the burden is greater on them than on Kansas, let them do at least as much as they can by levying an equivalent amount of tax before they call on us to eke out for them what they are so unwilling to do for themselves.

I do not speak in reference to any demand from the Southern States, and as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] says in my hearing they have made none, I do not say they do make any, but I am putting it upon all possible ground. If the States demand it, the answer is complete. They have not done themselves what they ought to have done; they have not acted in reference to their own resources as other States have in reference to theirs, and therefore there is no claim on their part that they should have this money from the National Treasury. They are able to do all that is necessary to be done. There is no pretense that Connecticut or Massachusetts or Kansas wants any of this money, and I say that you can not add money enough to the school fund of Massachusetts or Connecticut or Kansas to make any difference in the illiteracy prevailing in those States. There is no question about there being money enough in Massachusetts for educational purposes and no question about there being money enough in Connecticut for educational purposes, and so in New York and in Kansas and other Northern States, and yet there is a percentage of illiterate people in all those States. If the good people of Massachusetts or of Connecticut or of New York were able to see that by the expenditure of more money they could decrease the percentage of illiteracy that money would have been forthcoming long ago.

What is the result? That inevitably under any system we have heretofore been advised of, and in reference to any possible expenditure of money which is within human conception, some degree of illiteracy is bound to prevail and can not be helped.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has alluded to Massachusetts. I think it may be proper to say that the illiteracy in Massachusetts of natives of that State is only two-tenths of 1 per cent. of the entire population; and that includes not only natives of Massachusetts but all natives of the United States who are illiterate. So it is substantially and practically true that there is no person born in that State of sound mind over the age of 10 years who can not write.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me to make a single remark in the same direction as the observation of the Senator from Massachusetts? There is no excuse for any person of the most moderate degree of intelligence born and brought up in Connecticut who can not read and write. I have personally known but one such instance; there are doubtless others to be found. But the State is upon the seashore, and a considerable number of immigrants stop there who have not been fortunate in the places of their nativity. There is, therefore, reported against us a considerable amount of illiteracy, and we do the best we can with it.

Mr. PLUMB. That does not meet the proposition which I made.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was not controverting the Senator's proposition; I only made a statement of fact.

Mr. HOAR. I took the liberty when the Senator from Kansas mentioned Massachusetts to make that statement in reference to his remark that it was a necessity of the case that there should be some illiteracy, no matter how much the community endeavored to provide against it. The statistics show that there is substantially no illiteracy in my State except illiterates who were born beyond its borders.

Mr. PLUMB. The percentage of illiteracy in New Hampshire is 5 per cent.; in Massachusetts 6 per cent. and a fraction over.

Mr. HOAR. Not if native.

Mr. PLUMB. In Kansas it is 3 per cent. and a fraction over.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to correct the Senator in reference to the amount expended in Alabama for common schools. I thought I had the report of the superintendent of education of that State, but I find that it is at my house. I am satisfied that the amount expended last year was in the neighborhood of $400,000, and I know that the appropriations for the present year is over half a million.

Mr. BLAIR. If both Senators will excuse me, the superintendent of Alabama was before the committee, and as I recollect his statement it was that there would be very near the sum of $600,000 expended in Alabama the present year. The amount is increasing every year. It was about $400,000 in 1880, and it is increasing every year, and the State is taxing itself more and more every year for the purpose. At the same time under the provisions of this bill that State would receive nearly $1,200,000; one of the most needy States. So the effect of this amendment is apparent.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, Mr. President, I am glad to hear the statement that Alabama is doing better, and I am glad to bear witness, as far as I may with my imperfect knowledge, to the fact that all over the South there is an increasing disposition to support liberally and effectively the common schools in those States. It is because I would not check this that I oppose this bill. I believe that worse than to destroy one-half the property of the Southern States would be to put their schools under the benefaction of the General Government. I do not believe that any amount of money which is paid out by people who themselves do not originally pay it into the Treasury, disbursed by them, will ever do any good to any school system anywhere. I do not believe, on the whole, in school funds, but that the people who pay the tax should every year determine what in their judgment, quickened by their self-interest and by their knowledge and belief in regard to their own responsibility, is the proper amount to be levied and the way in which it shall be applied.

Reform, to use a hackneyed term, must come from within, in this case at all events, although I know our Democratic friends when they march up to the polls next November will proceed on a different theory. It is either reform that is begotten in the parent of the child who believes that his child should be educated and is stimulated by that belief to make sacrifices in the way of the payment of taxes necessary to perform that office. Without that, without the careful, the conscientious feeling of the parent himself in favor of the education of his child, there is no machine work on the part of the State that can ever supply that child with the education which it needs.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does the Senator think that anything very dangerous would result? I do not state it as an advocate of this bill, but I ask for information on his line of argument, is he aware that the General Government in times gone by set aside a very considerable portion of the public domain in the States in aid of education? Does he think any great detriment resulted to the system from the aid given by this Government to the States in that way?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know whether I should decide that it was a detriment or an advantage. Whichever way it is, it hugs the line very closely. Whether it would have been better to have given over the lands to public settlement under a wise and judicious homestead law than to have given them to the States to be sold for what money they could realize, to be put into their school fund, I am not competent to judge; but I put the advantage at all events at the minimum. I think in the early history of States like the State of Kansas the little money that was derived from the benevolent act of the Federal Government was an advantage in enabling the communities to get on their feet, and so anywhere; but as applied to an old State, to a State that has the population and the property necessary to carry on successfully the business of government, that there is an advantage in giving to them 60 or 70 or 80 cents a scholar is something I do not believe. The school fund of Kansas to-day yields 80 cents a scholar, and the people of Kansas pay over $9 added to that out of their own pockets. So the Senator can see that the amount given is very small indeed. It does not add perceptibly to the revenues of the State or sensibly diminish the burdens of taxation.

The people of that State entered upon that great domain known as the American Desert in 1855 and 1856. Practically there was no population there on which government could rest until several years later. Since that time they have erected out of the taxation which they have levied upon themselves over 5,000 school-houses, at a cost of over $5,000,000. They have maintained schools six and eight and nine months in the year in nearly every school district in that State. Men have gone out onto that frontier where there was no property of any kind, houses or cattle or any other thing hardly, and taxed themselves to a large proportion of their earnings, actually deprived themselves almost of the necessaries of life in order to maintain schools, and every tax-payer has felt an interest in schools because he has paid to keep them up.

The school meetings are town meetings, where everybody attends, men and women alike over the age of 21 years, all of them qualified to vote on the question of the taxes to be levied and the officers of the school districts, on the question of debt as well as of taxation and the question of the employment of teachers, and the number of months that the schools shall be kept open. They have levied out of their poverty thousands and tens of thousands and millions of dollars, which have come back to them seven, ten, ay and a hundred-fold, in added wealth and population drawn thence by the educational and social advantages which grew out of this free expenditure for schools. It has been the sign by which they have conquered. The school-house on the hill and the church near by represented not the benevolence of somebody on the outside, but the virtue and the self-sacrifice of the people themselves; and they paid for them out of their hard earnings; and that has attracted immigration, brought people to that country, laid broad and deep and strong the foundations of a commonwealth of which the whole nation is proud, as a crowning result of American civilization. There never was a school system, there never was a local administration of any kind, there never will be anything that is worth anything in human affairs where all things material to it are not the result of sacrifice on the part of those immediately concerned; and the beneficence of the General Government introducing itself into the school districts, into the townships, into the counties, into the States, with the arm of its power accompanied by its gold, will shrivel up all these aspirations of the people themselves, will induce them as far as anything can to put out their children to nurse to the General Government, take away the interest of the people in regard to this great subject, and substitute for it the idea of leaning upon the General Government for everything that is material with reference to this question of education.

I do not see in this any question of constitutional power, but I do see in it the most dangerous endeavor I have ever witnessed to extend the power of the Federal Government at the expense not only of the State governments but of every form of government within them. If there is any way in which the General Government can take to itself every particle of power in this country, from the smallest political subdivision to the greatest, it is by taking the children of this country at the age of 5 years and drawing to itself their control with its own money and its own teachers and its own instrumentalities until they come to the age of manhood and womanhood. That, Mr President, is the result which this bill is the first step toward. And yet what say the friends of State rights on the other side of the Chamber? Why are they silent? Is it because their people are to be the chief beneficiaries of the bill?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Do I understand the Senator to say that this bill does that?

Mr. PLUMB. This bill is the opening door to it. If the General Government pays $15,000,000 into the treasuries of the several States this year, every morning we shall be deluged with resolutions of inquiry to know from the Commissioner of Education how the money is spent in Louisiana and Alabama and other States, and my friend from New Hampshire will be filled with holy horror when he learns some day that in some portions of these States the black man whom he is now solicitous for has not his proportion, and at once there will be a committee of investigation and a resumption of the money—not of the money but of the instrumentalities by which it shall be spent. And the principle having been started that the Federal Government shall be accountable for results, it will apply it in its own way and through the hands of its own officials. That does not alarm me in any special way. I am willing to submit to that if that is the best thing to be done; for I believe in education, and I think it is the bane of the South that it does not pay more attention to the education of its children.

When an eminent Southerner about a year ago was complaining to me about the taxes in his own State, that they were nearly 1 per cent., I told him what the South wanted to learn was the grace to pay taxes. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] says the grace to pay 2 per cent. The people of Kansas pay an average of nearly 3 per cent. for all purposes. They pay 5 per cent. sometimes for school purposes alone in a single year, and always as much as may be necessary to accomplish the object of education for all. That State has grown and flourished and prospered because it has levied taxes freely for beneficial objects—for schools, for bridges, for public improvements—and it has then taken care that the money should be well spent. The man who is called upon to pay taxes says, "I want to know where this goes." He goes to the school meeting and town meeting and to the county election, and he is concerned about who shall represent him in spending it and what it shall be spent for; and out of it grows a responsibility and beneficent system of administration. The South to-day can afford to spend more money. It would be money in their pockets, and every year the assessment would grow up, the demand for property would be greater, the prices would be higher, new men would go in there with new capital, and there would be a double movement in the right direction throughout all that country. But, Mr. President, these results can not be reached by giving money out of the National Treasury.

Mr. HAMPTON. May I interrupt the Senator a moment to ask a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. HAMPTON. Is the Senator aware of the amount expended annually by the Southern States to-day for education?

Mr. PLUMB. I have here before me a table which purports to give that expenditure.

Mr. HAMPTON. What does the table state about it?

Mr. PLUMB. All the States together?

Mr. HAMPTON. Yes.

Mr. PLUMB. I have not got them all together, but I have a statement of what the expenditure purports to be in detail.

Mr. HAMPTON. I can inform the Senator that the Southern States apply annually $7,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. All the Southern States together?

Mr. BLAIR. That only includes a portion of the Southern States proper. The Southern States, those which were the slave States, including the District of Columbia, expend now some thirteen and a half millions; the present year it may be fourteen millions. In 1881 the returns of the Bureau of Education show that they spent thirteen million three hundred and odd thousand dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. I was going to remark that if all the Southern States together pay but $7,000,000 for school purposes they pay just the amount that my State alone pays.

Mr. PLUMB. The more the better. I hear with pleasure any statement that any Southern Senator will make in regard to increasing interest in the subject of education as manifested in the payment of taxes. I said a moment ago that I believed it to be for the interest of the Southern people that they should pay more taxes for schools and take hold of the subject in earnest. I rejoice in every evidence that they are willing to submit to increased taxation for this purpose, for I know that not only means more teachers and more school-houses, but a closer supervision and a more lively and wholesome interest in results, for as they pay more taxes they will give greater attention to the expenditure, and there will be better teachers, a better class of schools, and more and better advantages to be derived generally from the school system of those States than they have had heretofore.

It is because I want that to go on as it has gone on elsewhere, it is because those people are able to pay, it is because for every dollar they pay themselves they will get more good than they will from five spent by the General Government, that I do not want a bill of this kind to pass to check the rising aspirations of that section of the country, and of all sections of the country in fact, in regard to this pre-eminently important question. At once there comes a waiting to know how much the General Government is going to pay; and, mind you, the expenditure is based on illiteracy, not a premium for teaching the children to read and write; by no means; but the more ignorance you have got and the more you keep that ignorance the more money you will get and continually get. In my State when we apportion what we call the State school money for the purpose of enabling the western counties to get along until their lands become taxable, we give it to them in proportion to the number of children of school age that they put into school to educate and the number of months school is taught, and not in proportion to the number they do not put into school and educate.

This bill is a premium to every State desiring to receive this bounty to return as many illiterate children as it can, in order to magnify the amount it shall get. Its effect will be to keep up the very vice that it is aimed at, and to invite a return of illiteracy in order to make the donation from the General Government greater.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will observe that the bill provides that the distribution is to be made upon the returns of the census, which are taken by Federal officers. It can hardly be claimed that the States will be able to increase their illiteracy. The basis is the Federal enumeration.

Mr. PLUMB. If this bill passes we shall have entered on a subject of legislation which will be before us every session of Congress, demands here and demands there depending upon State censuses, upon official representations, upon private representations. You can not put $150,000,000 before any people as a bait without having every means in the world resorted to to get it. The bill provides for using the Federal census only until some other enumeration is provided for.

I shall regard the passage of a bill of this kind as the death-knell of the present school system of the United States. The appetite once created, the demand for more will be presented here each year, until finally the Government will appropriate for all the expenses and take full and sole control. With this will come a loss of interest on the part of the people, and the General Government will have charge of all the children of school age and be responsible for them.

Mr. President, the National Government can not do this thing as the States can anyhow. Wherever education is carried on as it should be the control of the subject is remitted to small bodies of people and to small territorial districts. It is the one thing that is brought closest home to the people. In my State there are sometimes in a municipal township six miles square two or three school districts. There is never less than one, and rarely less than two. It is brought, therefore, just as near home as you can bring any single scheme of government. It is a neighborhood affair. The men and women become interested in the management of the schools close to them. The taxes are levied there; the people are appealed to for the taxes and for all the machinery of the school, and it keeps alive that interest without which the school system would lose its power. Education carried on through the Federal Government as the center from which it should flow; all direction and control would simply scorch and destroy it. It would be absolutely vain to think of anything which could be called education from a common-school standpoint that should derive its source and power from the Federal Government. It is the one thing more than any other function of government, the one thing more than anything else that the people have an interest in, which they ought to keep close to themselves, regulate themselves in their own way, on their own plan; assimilated as near as may be to the family and kept close to the family; based upon the judgment of parents and tax-payers as to benefits; enlarged or modified, as the case may be, by individual knowledge and responsibility.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call up the conference report on the Military Academy bill which has been received from the House. I ask leave to make the report from the conference committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois presents a report from the committee of conference on the Military Academy appropriation bill. If there be no objection the report will be now read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, and 6, and agree to the same.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
M. W. RANSOM,
WILKINSON CALL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. WARREN KEIFER,
WM. H. FORNEY,
E. JNO. ELLIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the conference committee.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I will submit, to go into the RECORD, a statement showing the reductions made in conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be printed in the RECORD.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. BLAIR. Senators will find in table 15, on page 2202 of the RECORD of March 19, the figures to which I wish to call attention as bearing on that aspect of this question which has been discussed by the Senator from Kansas, the delinquency and failure to do what ought to be done in the Southern section of the country toward the education of the people. I may say that I concur in all that he says in reference to the high position taken on the subject of education by the citizens of Kansas, and that flourishing Commonwealth is a demonstration of the beneficial results of common schools. I am glad he has held up Kansas as an example for the country and the world to look at, and it will do not only the Southern States but many of the Northern States good to gaze upon her.

Now, in regard to the distribution of taxation, the burdens that fall upon us in this land in the various sections of the country, I ask attention to the third column of table 15, on the page of the RECORD which I have mentioned. There the various States are grouped together, with their total assessed valuation, total population, and valuation per capita. It will be seen that the New England group of States has a per capita valuation of $661, the Southern States have a per capita valuation of $155, the Western States have a per capita valuation of $334, the Middle States of $473, and the Territories of $211, while the average valuation of the entire country, north and south, Territories and all included, is $337.

As I stated yesterday, from a calculation based upon the valuation of the property of the colored people in that State, to wit, Georgia, where they are supposed to be best off, they are worth not exceeding $8; and it is a fair average, I think, taking all the South together, that they have an average assessable property not exceeding $5 apiece. Taken in connection with the suggestion that there are certain primary physical necessities that every individual must provide for, that every family must provide for, and that every State must provide for before it can expend for the higher purposes of life, such as education, the maintenance even of religious institutions, and the like, it is evident that the Southern people are relatively unable to bear taxation as compared with the rest of the country.

I restate in this connection a fact which I stated day before yesterday, and which is to be found and may be fully traced in table 16, on the next page, page 2203, that in thirteen of the Southern States there was an actual loss between 1870 and 1880 in taxable property of $202,868,844, and in ten of these States (there being an increase in three) there was a net loss of $411,475,090, and those are the States as much as any and more than any other in which aid is needed, for Texas has a very large school fund, and has an enormous mass of public lands available by dedication of the State to that purpose as they are sold. Missouri is not included in this list. Missouri is one of the more northern of those States, and has a large school fund, derived very largely from the public lands, as is the case with most of our Western friends, and their public schools are not in that extremity that they are in some other States.

Notwithstanding this disparity of capacity to bear taxation in the Southern States, we find by examination of table 18, on page 2204, the two last columns of the table, that the New England States had an average taxation of 1.58 per cent., a little over 1.5 per cent. for all purposes and a taxation for schools of 20.2 per cent. of the total taxation; 1.58 per cent. taxation on the valuation of the States, and of that amount so raised 20.2 per cent. is expended for schools. In the next group of States, the Middle States, the aggregate of taxation is 1.82 per cent., less than 2 per cent. upon taxable property in these States, and 19.5 per cent. of that amount is expended for schools; less, as you will see, than the amount paid in New England by nearly 1 per cent. In the Southern States the rate of taxation upon their entire valuation is the same as it is in New England, 1.58 per cent., of which taxation 20.1 per cent., the same as in New England lacking only one-tenth of 1 per cent., is paid out for schools in the Southern States to-day.

So then the Southern States tax themselves, notwithstanding their poverty, for all purposes as much as does New England with her wealth, and for the purpose of education (which is not one of the primary necessities of life, although in reference to advancement it is an indispensable necessity) they tax themselves the same as New England substantially. The Western States tax themselves at the rate of 2.8 per cent., almost 3 per cent. for all purposes; the highest rate of taxation considerably to be found in the whole country. That is in the Western States as a group. It might be well to bear in mind that the power to defray taxation depends on the producing capacity, and nowhere is wealth accumulated with any such rapidity as it is in the Western States. They can, without feeling the burden, bear taxation at 3 per cent. easier than the South can bear taxation at 1 per cent. The rate per cent. that money commands at interest and the rapidity of accumulation are such that a taxation of 3 per cent., I beg leave to remind my Western friends, is not greater in their States than is borne in New England at 1.5 per cent. to-day, and not so great as is borne in the South, for the South is taxed relatively much higher than is New England compared with the capacity to pay. A man who has $500 or $1,000 in a homestead has to maintain his family before he has anything in the way of surplus to spare for the State. In the Western States school taxation is 26.6 per cent. of the whole taxation, a little over one-fourth part. In the Territories the rate of taxation is 2.6 per cent. for all purposes, and 22.4 per cent. of that amount is expended for schools.

Mr. President, there is one other point to which I should like to call the attention of the Senate in these tables bearing upon the remarks of the Senator from Kansas. By referring to page 2207 of the RECORD, table 22, in the last column will be seen the per capita of school expenditure in 1881, increased by the proportion which each State will have of the $15,000,000 which it is proposed to expend by this bill the first year and to distribute on the basis of illiteracy. By reference to that table any Senator can see the amount that would still remain to be expended in the several States according to the needs so far as the children or the educable population are concerned. That table is based not on illiteracy, but it shows how much there will be after this distribution for each child whom it is necessary to educate at all.

I will make part of my remarks a telegram just received, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that a telegram on this subject be read. If there be no objection it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., March 20, 1884.

Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The National Educational Association and the Interstate Federal Aid Commission, with all prominent educational men, urge the passage of the education bill before the United States Senate.

THOS. W. BICKNELL,
President of National Educational Association and of Federal Commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], in line 10 of section 8, after the word "school," to strike out "at least one-third of" and insert "an amount equal to."

Mr. LOGAN. Before the amendment is acted on, as I was out when the vote was taken on the amendment to section 2, I wish to say that I had an amendment to propose.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator's amendment has not been offered.

Mr. LOGAN. No; and I desire to offer the amendment; but that section having been passed, I desire to know whether we can go back to it at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is all open.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All parts of the bill will be open to amendment after this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the question because we had passed over that section and I did not know whether the Senator from Kansas would allow a vote to be taken on my proposition before his amendment is acted on.

Mr. SHERMAN. It makes no difference.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not material. I will state, however, that I propose, in section 2, line 4, to offer an amendment to include in this distribution all between the ages of 10 and 20. I shall propose that an appropriation be made within the ages of 10 and 20, because that comes within the census report, showing the illiteracy in reference to children between the ages of 10 and 20 years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. BLAIR. Let the amendment be read again and stated so that the Senate may understand it. It is a vital amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. Read the bill as it will stand if amended in that connection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clause proposed to be amended will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided that no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof, and during the second five years of its operation a sum at least equal to the whole amount it shall be entitled to receive under this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is in line 10, section 8, after the word "schools," to strike out "at least one-third of" and insert "an amount equal to;" so as to read:

Shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools an amount equal to the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof.

Mr. CALL. I hope this amendment will not be adopted, but that the bill will be allowed to stand as it was reported by the committee. If the principle of the bill is correct, if there is any propriety or wisdom in the Government of the United States making a donation of money for the cause of education in these States, it can not be made effective upon the basis of the ability of the States or the willingness of the States to give one-half as much as the United States gives. The purpose of the bill is to provide the means of education and to remove ignorance, from whatever cause it may have come.

I do not propose now to investigate why it is that there is a large population in some parts of this country which is without education. It does not matter or concern the object of this bill why it is that this grievous evil is upon the country; but the bill proposes to give aid to the States in conformity with the principles of this Government for the eradication of an admitted evil, an evil that unquestionably threatens the prosperity of this country and its future welfare, not alone in one but in every point of view; for the economic considerations which attach to education, industrial as well as common school, of which the common school is but the foundation, demand that whether the States be inert or active; whether our Government is a correct form of government or an incorrect one, as some of the arguments in opposition to the bill assert; whether we have failed in establishing institutions that are adequate to carry into effect the great principle of popular government or not, as has been indicated by the Senator from Ohio, for whose ability I have a great respect, and as is indicated in this amendment from the honorable Senator from Kansas; whether the principle of a National Government and one of States is a correct form of institution or not; whether the people who live within the States are intelligent and capable citizens, or degraded and unmanly people not to be trusted, as has been stated by some Senators, or not, this Government is equally concerned in providing the means for the eradication of that evil.

This bill has been carefully considered, and the aid to education provided in it is sought to be given in conformity with our institutions, with our system of the distribution of power of that which is local to the States and that which is general or national to the United States, and we have determined, after full consideration by the committee, in conformity with the opinion of all the educators throughout the country, that this would be a fair proposition. Now, that may not be so. There may be some other amount in proportion which would do as well or better, but no reason has been given to show any better proportion; none can be. The Senator from Kansas says that it will destroy the desire on the part of the people of these States for education to furnish them to any extent the means of education and that it will be an inducement to them to make their people appear more illiterate than they are. But this money can be applied by them to no other purpose than that specified in the bill; it can be used for no other purpose; and it is impossible that it should have the effect of inducing the States to represent their people as more illiterate than they are, because the amount of aid is not determined by any representation of the States, but by a census already taken.

I undertake to say, Mr. President, and perhaps I may have something more to say when the bill comes up again, that you can not appropriate too much money in this country for education. We are proud of our educational institutions, and they are now and will be in the future still more essential to the welfare of this country and to its future prosperity as dependent on industrial economies essential to destroy the rapidly increasing poverty of large numbers of people in our own country and the vast inequalities of fortune which have been exhibited before the committee, essential to provide remunerative employment for the 600,000 laboring people who have had their representatives time and again before the Committee on Education and Labor to protest against the neglect of them and their interests and their inadequate employment and pay.

I undertake to say that you can not give too much for education; too much to prepare for industrial education to remedy that great evil which is growing up of the want of adequate and remunerative employment for our people. The more we become wealthy the more consolidated and concentrated in a few persons our wealth becomes, and the more necessary it is that the cause of education in its application to the economic interests of the country shall be regarded. Even in Kansas and even in Massachusetts, admirable as their institutions are, they are yet behind some other portions of the world, and behind the necessities of the time in those branches of education which are essential to the easy and comfortable support and welfare of their people and to such a distribution of wealth or production as will effect this end. But so far as this great evil exists in any portion of the country, in the Southern States especially, so far as this evil which appertains deeply and largely to the whites and to the colored people who have been placed in that condition by the power and the laws of the National Government, for whatever purposes it was done in respect to them, there can certainly be no objection to fixing the amount provided in this bill as the condition for aid to the States from the National Government. That amount, namely, one-third, has been fixed with reference to the amount necessary for the education of the number of persons in each State who are without any education and with reference to the means which such States are able to apply to this object.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, this bill is not consistent with itself. It is a heterogeneous mixture of national and State authority without any parallel in the legislation of this country. Reference has been made here repeatedly to the grant of lands to the Western States; but no such bill was ever enacted by the Congress of the United States with similar conditions in the grant of lands for educational purposes as is found in the bill before us.

This bill, as one of its provisions declares, is not intended to establish an independent system of education, but is only to assist the States, and the General Government becomes only an auxiliary, an instrumentality, to help the States, and not to dictate or control the mode of education of the State itself. And yet in another provision of the bill the National Government comes down into the States and prescribes the school-books which are to be used in the States under this aid that is given to them by the National Government. It ought to be either one or the other. If the States are to control, then——

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know that I understood the Senator. I understood him to say that the bill prescribed the text-books that should be used in the schools.

Mr. VEST. I mean to say this: that it prescribes that certain branches of learning shall be taught.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, yes.

Mr. VEST. Reading, writing, arithmetic, and geography.

Mr. BLAIR. It does do that.

Mr. VEST. In other words, instead of leaving that to the States——

Mr. BLAIR. It enumerates the common-school branches of education, because it proposes that the money shall go to common schools.

Mr. VEST. Exactly. Instead of leaving this question to the States, that have always hitherto governed and controlled in this matter, now the General Government is to go down and say what shall be taught in the public schools in the different States. Why, sir, the Republican platform, which the Senator himself read in his last address to the Senate, declared that this question of education was one for the States to control, and no other doctrine has ever been held by any school in this country, either Mr. Hamilton, or Mr. Jefferson, or Mr. Madison, or any expounder of the Constitution.

I do not propose to discuss the constitutional question here. I believe I have rather lost my standing as a State-rights advocate by voting for the resolution of the Senator from Kansas appropriating $50,000 to remove the foot-and-mouth disease. But I can not refrain from expressing some wonder at not having heard a single voice lifted on this side of the Chamber in this debate in favor of the Calhoun and Jeffersonian doctrine. All is silent now, although a few days ago there was a clamor here for a strict construction of the Constitution and the last degree of State rights according to the old school.

If this power comes from any section of the Constitution, it comes from the one invoked so elaborately the other day by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], the clause in regard to the general welfare, which, as Sancho Panza said about sleep, covers a man all over like a blanket—the general-welfare clause, under which we are expected to do anything and everything for anybody and everybody throughout this country. I do not propose to discuss that question at all further than to say that if this power comes from any clause of the Constitution, the power to interfere with education in the States, it comes from that clause, and if the General Government can touch this question at all it can touch it because the evil is a national one and affects the welfare of the United States. The language of that clause in the Constitution is that—

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare—of the United States.

Of whom? Not of the States, not of the people, not of communities, but—

And therefore this evil must be one that affects the whole country, it must be national, and it must be subject to national jurisdiction. I mean to say that when you derive this power from that clause of the Constitution, it is because the evil is a national one and the redress must be national.

If it is a national power, it must be carried out and can only be carried out by the instrumentality which the Constitution has provided in regard to national powers, and that instrumentality is the President of the United States and his subordinates, and not the States or the State Legislatures. Where is the power found here on the part of the National Government to set aside a fund or to give it to the States and say then that the States shall part of the time control it and part of the time not control it? If you give this to the States outright and absolutely, then the States should have the power to control the public schools, the studies in those schools, and all the different departments of an educational system in the States. But instead of doing that this bill gives it to the States in one place and takes it away in another. It says in one clause that this is not a bill to establish a general system, an independent system of Federal education, and in the next clause it says that the States shall do so and so, and if they do not then they shall pay the penalty; and this penalty is most remarkable. They are permitted to take the first installment under this appropriation and misappropriate it or do with it what they please, and then it is provided that when they come the next time if there be fault then discovered and made known to Congress, the General Government may then impose on them the forfeiture of all subsequent appropriations.

I agree absolutely, Mr. President, with the Senator from Kansas in saying that I do not believe this bill will do any good for the cause of education. The Senator from New Hampshire has presented the bill and I respect his motives, but I pay no attention to telegrams that come here from abstractionists and theorists who know nothing about the negro population of the South and who talk about applying the same rules to them that are applicable to the Caucasian race. It is an absurdity, and any man who has lived with the African population in the South knows it to be an absurdity. Whom does the telegram come from? It comes from some estimable gentleman in Massachusetts who does not know any more about the negro than I know to-day about the internal arrangements of Kamtchatka, and not as much.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to make an observation at that point?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. This telegram is from a gentleman who knows more, I venture to say, about the subject-matter under discussion in the Senate than the entire Senate together. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. We had better have him here then.

Mr. BLAIR. He has come by his telegram and sent his opinion. In saying that I do not undertake to disparage the knowledge of the Senate. He is a man of high ability, who has devoted himself to educational subjects for now what is getting to be a long life. He attended the national convention recently held in the Southern States on the same subject. He is as largely a representative man, and has indicated in what directions by his signature to the telegram, as any educator in the country; and I assure the Senator he hardly does him justice in the terms he applies.

Mr. VEST. I do not know the gentleman and make no reflection on him. I speak of a class; I speak of the abstractionists who flood the country with treatises on education in the South and call on Congress to appropriate millions of dollars and allow the States to distribute the money under a bill which is first Federal, and then derives its power from the States, and then goes back to the General Government again.

Now, Mr. President, this sort of thing is often heard in regard to the Indians. The country is flooded and inundated with theories in regard to educating Indians. Millions of dollars have been spent by this Government for day schools and public schools among the Indians, and what do they amount to? You may go from one end of the country to the other—and I speak from personal observation as to a large portion of it—you may go into all the Indian reservations, and their day schools are the veriest frauds and humbugs ever seen by mortal man. They have, as I saw last summer on one reservation, an attendance, as one of the teachers stated before our committee, of from seventy-five to five hundred scholars during the week, varying from seventy-five to five hundred, and when she was asked the question, "How does it happen that this variation occurs; when do five hundred come?" she said they came on ration day, Saturday, and the balance of the week there would be from seventy-five to two hundred and two hundred and fifty and three hundred, and out of the whole number but three or four of them could understand the English language. I asked her what the Government taught those Indians. She said "enumeration;" and upon cross-examination it turned out that two of the scholars could count up to twenty-two, and for that the Government of the United States paid its money.

The whole secret of it is that you can not sustain a system of education among an inferior race, like the negroes, or like the Indians, unless you use some sort of compulsion. The only schools to-day that are leading the Indians one single step from barbarism are the boarding-schools established by the Jesuits and other denominations, where the children are taken away from the father and mother and brought into the habitudes and customs and principles of civilized life. If you let them go back to their people, instead of elevating their people they are degraded by the association, and their last state is worse than the first.

I do not propose to argue this bill at any great length, but I simply wish to say that I want universal education as much as any Senator in this Chamber, because I believe that universal suffrage should be accompanied by universal education; but you will never get it by any such system as this. I was glad to hear my friend from Kansas take the Democratic ground that when the United States went into the local and domestic affairs of a State it paralyzed the energies of any people. In every State people must be taught to depend upon themselves, and only in that way can we have the proper amount of general common-school education throughout the country. Without that there must be and inevitably will be a failure.

If I am asked for the remedy, I am not compelled to give it, but I will frankly say that in my judgment the remedy above all others that has commended itself to me is so to amend our Constitution and so to arrange our laws that every State shall have representation in Congress not according to its whole population as now, but according to its population who over a certain age can read and write. When that is done, when you make it the interest of the States to educate their own people, you will find that domestic instrumentalities will take hold of this question, and you need not then resort to the glittering generalities and to the incongruous collection of systems and principles and legislation that is found in this bill.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I wish to call attention directly and in very few words to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas as I understand it. I shall not discuss the general features of the bill now. I propose before we get through with it to simply stand again on the plane that I have from the first vote I ever cast in this body to the present day, and to cover this subject with the general-welfare clause, the blanket clause of the Constitution; and when I come to discuss that I shall not read the liberal or the loose authorities, but I will read some of the constipated authorities on the subject of the Constitution.

If I understand the Senator from Kansas, his amendment is that we must show that the same amount the Government contributes each year is contributed by the States. I suppose that would serve the intention of the Senator who offered it, that is, to destroy the bill in many instances; and it is to that I wish to call the attention of the Senate. According to the returns here, and some of them, as shown by the Senator from New Hampshire, are incomplete necessarily, but taking those which are true and correct, some of the States that would get the benefits of this act are absolutely unable, do all that they may and do the very best they can, to make a contribution equal to this; so that if you withhold this contribution on that score you take it from them entirely. When I come to speak upon the bill generally, I think I can show from the very best authority that the States which have been alluded to, the Southern States particularly, have done the very best upon the common-school system that they can. If you say they must do more than that you simply withhold from them this contributory relief, for it is but contributory at last. It is to assist them in their efforts at this somewhat novel system to them, a system adopted since the war, the common-school system in general.

If the amendment should be adopted as offered by the Senator from Kansas, the bill would be virtually destroyed as to some States. If that is the purpose, of course it serves its purpose very well; but if the friends of the bill wish to pass it and to make it effectual they can not vote for the amendment.

My distinguished friend from Missouri voted for the resolution finally upon its passage to which he alluded himself, and when the Senator from Kansas was satisfied that we could go into Kansas, as I was and am still, by a contribution to cure the foot-and-mouth disease of cattle, I had hoped and thought and believed that there would be no difficulty on his part in concluding that we could go into the States to cure a much worse and a more calamitous disease among the people. If that is the purport of his amendment and meets with his approbation, I am somewhat astonished at his offering it after the experience he had last Friday and Monday in the vote upon the Kansas resolution.

I wish briefly to call the attention of the Senate to the status of the question upon that point, and that is all that I care to say for the present. I wish the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire for a moment who has the bill in charge. In the eighth line of this same section that is under discussion this language is used:

During the first five years of the operation of this act.

I have bothered over that a good deal. If that means just what it says, nothing can be paid until the end of the five years, because you would not know the default until that time.

Mr. BLAIR. That difficulty was suggested yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], and it struck me as one of the refinements of an unusually acute mind that directed both the telescope and the microscope to the dissection of this bill. I am inclined to think I may have been the one in fault if the Senator from Arkansas finds a difficulty also; and if either Senator, or both, will suggest the language that will relieve the bill of any ambiguity there, I shall be very glad to have it incorporated.

Mr. PUGH. My understanding is that there was an amendment to meet that objection agreed upon.

Mr. GARLAND. No, there was no amendment agreed upon as I understand. I think there is a mistake as to that.

Mr. PUGH. I certainly so understood.

Mr. GARLAND. Now let us see whether the point made is telescopic, microscopic, or horoscopic.

Mr. PUGH. My understanding was that an amendment was proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], and that it was accepted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair stated that no amendment could be accepted, and the pending question then was upon another amendment; that it could be afterwards proposed.

Mr. GARLAND. The language is, "During the first five years of the operation of this act."

Mr. BLAIR. "Annually." "During the first five years of the operation of this act, annually." There can be nothing clearer.

Mr. GARLAND. How is that to be shown?

Mr. BLAIR. "Annually" here means once a year for five years. The bill requires reports to be made every year.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not exactly comprehend it. It may be so.

Mr. BLAIR. Other sections of the bill make it clear.

Mr. GARLAND. But I want to have the provision as clear as possible.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish the Senator to have it so that he will be perfectly satisfied that it says what it means. I am ready to accede to the adoption of any amendment he suggests, and if he wants a little time to fashion the language to be substituted it can be done at another time.

Mr. PUGH. Here is what passed on yesterday as reported in the RECORD——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. I said to the Senator from Kansas:

Let me make another suggestion in regard to section 8, as to the meaning of that section in relation to the expenditure of the amount appropriated during the first five years. I think it would be well to amend it by inserting, after the word "expend," in the ninth line, the words "out of its own revenue;" so as to read:

"That no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not during the first five years of the operation of this act annually expend out of its own revenue for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof, and during the second five years of its operation a sum at least equal to the whole amount it shall be entitled to receive under this act."

Then, under section 13, the Senator will see how the information is derived by the Federal Government as to the State having complied with the terms prescribed in the eighth section.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will see that even with his amendment the section is still inaccurate.

Mr. PUGH. I thought the Senator would make it clear.

Mr. INGALLS. "Annually expend out of its own revenues," as amended by the Senator from Alabama, "for the maintenance of common schools," as it now reads, "at least one-third of the sum." It should be amended by inserting, after the word "schools:"

"An amount equal at least to one-third."

Mr. PUGH. That is satisfactory.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no objection to that.

Mr. PUGH. There will be no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. Let that be fixed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas regulating age.

Mr. INGALLS. With the consent of the Senate, upon the suggestions already made, I will modify my amendment, if the Chair will permit me, by making it read: "between the ages of 5 and 20 years."

I see there was no objection to that amendment, as I thought.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill could not be changed without the Chair putting the question to the Senate and another question was pending at that time, so that the Chair could not in order entertain it.

Mr. PUGH. There is certainly no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas and now suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will excuse me——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to try my hand on a suggestion?

Mr. PUGH. If in order——

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. GARLAND. I believe I shall have to yield to the first one in order. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PUGH. If in order, I move to insert the words proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not now in order; another amendment is pending.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not believe that either the Senator from Alabama or the Senator from New Hampshire understands exactly what I am proposing here. Admitting that all has gone in that the Senator from Alabama has suggested, it does not meet the difficulty yet:

Which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools, &c.

You have got to construe the term "five years" and "annually" together to make a complete sentence. What does that mean? It means that you must bring your reports here for five years, showing that each year you make this expenditure, and therefore you can not get any contribution until after the lapse of five years. That is perfectly plain upon this language. Upon similar language, in a bill to pay Southern ante bellum mail-carriers, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], then the Secretary of the Treasury, construed us entirely out of court. That is, he made them all bring their claims to be approved before any money could be paid to any one, and his construction doubtless was right upon the face of the law, and such would be the construction here. You must take the "five years" and "annually" together; that is, that each year's expenditure for five years in the aggregate must show this. You never will know that each year has been complied with until your five years are out. That is the difficulty I am laboring under.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator from Arkansas or any other Senator will suggest language that will relieve the difficulty I am willing that it shall be adopted.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair allow the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to be read for information at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] will be reported for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 8, line 10, after the word "schools," it is proposed to strike out the words "at least one-third of" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "an amount equal to;" so as to read:

No part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools an amount equal to the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Arkansas will give me his attention——

Mr. GARLAND. I am giving it.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to amend the bill by inserting after the words "which shall not," in the eighth line of the eighth section, the words "each preceding year have complied so far with the conditions hereof as is required for that year," and then begin the following sentence, "each State shall during the first five years annually expend," &c.

Mr. GARLAND. I think that meets the difficulty.

Mr. HOAR. I trust there will be unanimous consent to inserting that in the section at this time so that we may not have to go back to it again.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. It will be in order to move the amendment after the question is taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HOAR. I will move the amendment at that time.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this section is past all surgery. It is maimed and lame and halt and blind, and will not, no matter how it may be passed, effectuate in any way whatever what I suppose to be the desire of the committee. Look at the first few lines of it. There is an argument or a declaration inserted at the beginning of section 8 as follows:

That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided that—

What has that to do with legislation—a declaration about what the design or purpose or intention of the act is? It seems to me that somebody who was very inexpert in legislative literature must have prepared this section at least, and I can think of no better use to put it to and no better course to pursue than to refer it to the eminent gentleman from Boston who sent us the telegram which has just been read, and who we have been assured is so entirely familiar with all the needs and wants of education in this country.

But the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Alabama both apparently forgot that there were two difficulties in the succeeding portion of this section. In the first place, it is evident, under the language that is employed in the succeeding lines to what I have read, that no part of this money can be drawn out of the Treasury until five years after the passage of the bill. The Senator from New Hampshire may characterize that as telescopic or microscopic or polariscopic, or whatever other scopic he may see fit to apply to it; but the fact remains, and the plainest interpretation will admit of nothing else but that. We are called upon to enact into a law a bill which says that no portion of the money shall be appropriated until five years after the act is passed. It may be called verbal criticism, or narrowness of horizon, or impossibility of giving a broad, general, comprehensive treatment to this great subject, but that fact remains under this language:

No part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend, &c.

How can any portion of that money be expended until five years have elapsed, for how are you to know whether they have annually appropriated for five years the amount of money that this bill calls for until the time has expired? That may be intellectual microscopy or telescopy or polariscopy, but when we are dealing with a measure of this importance, that involves the expenditure of $105,000,000, it is worth while, perhaps, to apply the microscope a trifle to the bill that is under our consideration, as well as to apply the telescope to the far-off distance which we are called upon to deal with in the subject-matter of the bill.

That is the first difficulty in this section. Aside from the argumentation that occupies the first five or six lines of it this is the first difficulty, and then follows the one which was called up yesterday, which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] has alluded to, where the original language was:

Shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools—at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof.

That is to say, if the Government sends into Alabama under the provisions of this bill $300, all that they are required to expend in Alabama is $100 of that $300, and the remaining $200 can be kept for any purpose that they see fit to use it for. I suggested yesterday that after the word "expended" should be added the words "out of its own revenue," and after the word "schools" the words "an amount equal to," which would have made some remote possibility of ascertaining what was intended so far as that clause is concerned. But with regard to the first part of this section which comes after the argument, I say that there is no amendment that can carry out what is evidently the purpose or was the purpose of those who framed the bill. If you are to withhold all payments and expenditures under this act out of the money that is provided for in the bill until you have ascertained, at the expiration of five years, that an amount equal annually to the amount of that money has been spent by the State, then the bill may as well not pass at all in any shape.

I will, however, venture upon one contribution to the phraseology, and suggest that it would be rendered somewhat more intelligible than it is if the words "during the first five years of the operation of this act" were to be stricken out entirely, so that it should provide:

That no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not annually expend for the maintenance of common schools, &c.

For I suppose it can not be the intention of even the gentleman from Boston, who has sent his telegram here instructing us what we shall do and that this bill ought to be passed just exactly as the committee reported it, that this is the only thing that will accomplish these great results. I suppose even the gentleman from Boston would hardly be willing to have a limitation put into the bill that would prevent the expenditure of any portion of the money for five years. Of course I am ready to sit at the feet of Gamaliel to take instructions, and if it is absolutely essential that the bill must be passed in the very words of the text as it appears from the committee and we must take it and swallow it and pass it, I would suggest that even with the admonition which we have received, with the instruction that has been sent down to us like a celestial benediction, it might be well perhaps to inquire a little further into the phraseology of the bill even if it requires examination by the microscope and the telescope.

Mr. HARRISON. I venture modestly to suggest a contribution to the phraseology of the section which we have been discussing. I am not sure whether it is admissible now, if a point of order is made, as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. It proposes to strike out some words in the section that are not covered by his amendment, but it is practically to the same point that his amendment is addressed. I propose to amend the section and I ask the attention of the Senator from Kansas who has just addressed the Senate [Mr. INGALLS]. Beginning after the word "provided," in line 6, section 8, I suggest to strike out what follows and to insert:

That no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

Of course we can take the preceding year as the basis upon which this distribution is to be made, if we are to be in a condition to make any distribution until that year in which it is to be used is ended. I therefore suggest this amendment, taking the preceding year as the basis of the expenditure and limiting the expenditure to the amount which the State out of its own revenue in the preceding year has used for the purposes of education—an equal amount, not including of course moneys expended for school buildings. If this amendment is adopted, the measure of the gratuity or aid of the General Government is the activity and liberality of the State itself in support of public schools, each year's appropriation being determined by what the State has done in the preceding year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas, as the Chair understands the agreement when the general amendment of the committee was adopted, is open to amendment. If the Senator from Indiana will send to the Chair in writing the amendment he proposes the Chair will then rule whether it is in order or not.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas be put in writing, unless it is proposed to substitute this for his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas has been received and reported two or three times; so unless the Senator from Kansas chooses to reduce it to writing the Chair thinks that he would have no right to order him to do so. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be reported, after which the Chair will decide, when the question is made, whether it will be in order.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 8, line 6, after the word "provided," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section and to insert:

That no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

Mr. HARRISON. All the remainder of the section will be stricken out. That appears on the other page.

Mr. INGALLS. I was going to suggest that unless the latter part of the section was stricken out they would not be able to get any money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not a question of order.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a question of disorder.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not see why the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Arkansas have conceived so violent an objection to the amendment which I proposed, and which in its sense and particulars is substantially the same as that of the Senator from Indiana. While it is true I do not think the bill should pass, I yet can not conceive that it could be in any worse shape than it is now in reference to the accomplishment of any good purpose, and it certainly is not beyond the proper purview of those who oppose the bill to endeavor to get it into such a shape as to make it less objectionable and to accomplish the least evil.

If the bill is to pass at all it ought to pass in the shape of a stimulus to the States to do their part. As it is now it is not a stimulus to them to do their part, but it is a plain invitation to them to do as little as possible. For the first five years all they need to do is to appropriate from their own revenue one-third of what the General Government gives them. They ought to be willing to vote dollar for dollar at least. I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to put it in the other shape; and if they are not willing to appropriate so much as would fall to them by this allotment, to at least give them a dollar where they appropriate a dollar.

But why do these States or the persons who represent them on this floor and who are asking for this benefaction avow their unwillingness to do what they ought to do and what the Northern States are doing themselves in order to realize the benefit of this act? The State of Kansas, after this shall have been adopted, will not get certainly more than one-half of the amount which she will levy each year for the purpose of common schools within her borders and not one-half the amount she will pay out on account of it. In what way is it a burden upon any State for the General Government to come forward with its hand full of money and say, "Put an equivalent amount with ours and put both sums into your treasury for the benefit of common schools?" If that is a burden, why stop at a third and not go the whole figure? What charm is there in this sum of one-third that so captivates those persons who are seeking the benefit of this bill that they want that particular sum? Is it not because there is a determination not to do more than is now being done to maintain the present relation between expenditure and necessity and to ask the General Government to give the remainder, and to give it upon a basis which will require us to increase the amount every single year instead of diminishing it? It is for the purpose of making this bill at least to have some regard for the interest of the people of the United States at large, to have it act as a stimulus to the people who are to receive its benefits, to themselves contribute liberally and thereby feel and be actuated by the spirit of a support upon substantial and honorable grounds of the school system of the respective States, and not upon the basis simply of what they can receive from the General Government.

I did not find, as the Senator from Arkansas seemed to think I found, any constitutional objection to this bill. I admit its entire constitutionality, but I object to its policy, not to its lawfulness; and I object to it because as I believe it will not only be inefficient, but I believe conscientiously that it will destroy the very system that it is designed to protect and to nourish. That is the ground on which I put it.

But it seems certain that the Senate is getting into something of a tangle about the terms of this bill, and that it needs not the action of the Senate at large for the purpose of reducing it to shape and getting it into a condition where it will meet with approval, but the action of a committee. I think that the mover of the bill himself will realize that it ought to go back to the committee, and the committee ought to consider themselves instructed by the action of the Senate to bring in a measure which shall be freed from the objections which have been interposed to this one. By this course a debate of weeks may be avoided.

I shall therefore presently, if some one else does not, except for something that I am not now advised of, move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Education and Labor with a view that it may be perfected.

Mr. BLAIR. So far as verbal imperfections or inaccuracies or indefiniteness of expression are concerned in the bill, I am willing that any critic upon proposed legislation should compare it with any production of either Senator from Kansas and divide the result. Now that the one who first spoke has relieved himself from that mass of matter, which certainly is much better within so far as looks are concerned than without, I hope we shall get along. So far as I am concerned, in regard to amendments offered from any source whatever, which are not manifestly hostile to a consideration of the bill upon its merits and are not designed covertly to injure while speciously pretending to be favorable to the general purpose which the bill seeks to accomplish, I shall be very glad indeed to co-operate in securing the adoption of such amendments.

I would suggest to both Senators who make allusions to telegrams and to the efforts of the Senate to perfect measures which come before them, that they recall the fact that only a few days ago one Senator from Kansas undertook to telegraph through a measure to establish hospitals for sick calves all over this country and he had nothing else to depend upon but telegrams, and he undertook to prevent a fair consideration of the important principles involved in the resolution which he offered here by reason of his multitudinous telegrams, which one Senator says are truthful and another Senator says only indicate the necessity of immediate action, lest the recovery of the sick cattle should defeat the resolution, and he could hardly wait his twenty-four hours for authentic intelligence from the happy land of Kansas, that he has so eulogized upon the floor of the Senate to-day—and I affirm that his eulogies are well deserved—he could hardly wait until we could get accurate information by telegraph from that country. I have myself heard nothing since the passage of the resolution of any particular necessity for the $50,000 that it proposes to use in curing the cattle and hogs of this land, while he allows the children all over the country, in his own as well as in other States, who are growing up in ignorance and illiteracy, to go uncared-for.

I am very anxious indeed that this bill should be subjected to the most searching and friendly criticism. I am not here to listen tamely or acquiescingly to the sort of euphonious and sarcastic sound with which the Senator from Kansas who last spoke or the one on my immediate left indulged in the criticism of this bill. I am not inclined to think that he is a friend even of the general objects of the bill and that from the beginning his talk of friendly feeling toward the grand purpose of this bill had any foundations in fact. I know very well, and it is apparent enough, that there is a disposition on the part of some members of the Senate to defeat this bill by indirection. I much prefer an open, manful, and outspoken method of conducting warfare. I am accustomed to that.

Here an amendment comes in moved by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], a friend to the bill. I do not know that that Senator from Kansas will claim that he is a friend of the bill, but he is a remarkably strong friend to education generally. He proposes that the Southern States, or the States where the aid is most needed, shall be required the first year, when their emergency and need is the greatest, to pay a sum equivalent to the amount that they receive from the appropriation itself, when the appropriation is the largest that will be made. The first year it is to be $15,000,000. It decreases annually. It is manifestly the purpose to apply the largest amount when the greatest need exists. That must be perceived by everybody to be the real object of the bill, as it ought to be the object of the bill.

Now let us see what would be the result of the adoption of the amendment that is proposed. The Senator says, and the Senator from Indiana embodies the same idea in his amendment to the amendment, that the States ought to give as much as they receive. I wish merely to state now the actual effect of that. By the returns of 1880 the State of Alabama raised from State and local tax $250,000. By way of fines and forfeitures, &c., that amount was somewhat increased. It was not far, as I remember, from $350,000, possibly $400,000 in the year 1881; and as I said a little while ago, it is thought by the superintendent of education that the present year it will extend to not far from $600,000, and they are struggling, doing their utmost to achieve that amount.

By the provisions of this bill, dividing the $15,000,000 on the basis of those who can not write 10 years of age and upwards, the State of Alabama would receive $1,127,869. In other words, she would be obliged substantially under the amendment proposed to double her taxation immediately for school purposes in order to receive anything whatever of this appropriation. Other Senators can arrive at these same data by taking table 12, on page 2200 of the RECORD. Take the State of Arkansas. In the year 1880 she raised from State and local tax $189,000 for schools. By the provisions of this bill she would receive the first year $466,000. Of course the appropriation would diminish every year. Take the State of Delaware, for instance. She raised in the year 1880 $150,000 for schools. By the operation of this bill Delaware would receive as her proportion $51,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the Senator how he ascertains the amount of money which was raised for school purposes in the State of Delaware.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose there are ways of arriving at the amount of money raised in the State of Delaware for school purposes, and that the same means are applied there as in other States. This table was prepared by the Bureau of Education.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will state to the Senator that we have a school fund which is appropriated by the State, but that the State authorities have nothing else to do with the amount of money raised for educational purposes. The State distributes this fund, giving to each district a certain proportion of the State fund upon condition that the district raises a certain amount specified in the law by taxation itself. But moneys so raised by taxation never go into the State treasury, they are never handled by any State authority or by any county authority—simply by the commissioners of the district. There are no data, therefore, in the State from which that estimate can be made. The Senator has stated, perhaps, the money distributed over the State out of the school fund proper, but it does not include the amount raised by local taxation in each particular district.

Mr. BLAIR. These particulars are returned by the school authorities of the various States directly to the Bureau of Education.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am satisfied that that must apply to the distribution of the school fund, which goes into the hands of the school districts from the State.

Mr. BLAIR. No; it covers the amount of State tax and local tax. I have another table here which shows other amounts.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I know that in the small town in which I live we raise by local taxation for the support of common schools between two and three thousand dollars, which never goes into the State treasury and does not go into the county treasury.

Mr. BLAIR. It is a local tax.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is collected by the State and county machinery, but is a local matter and entirely applicable to the district.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no quarrel certainly with the Senator on that matter.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I make the statement because I notice that the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana is that the State shall pay "out of its own revenues." The money which is collected by taxation for school purposes in my State is not paid out of the State revenues, for it never goes into the State treasury.

Mr. BLAIR. That may be all true; very likely it is so. Notwithstanding the table is made up from definite returns, and it is true of every State in the Union.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to make a statement in regard to the school-tax of Oregon.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator please, I wish to put in a few statements from the tables and then I will yield to him. I would a little rather not have so much matter injected into my speeches. The State of Florida raised $104,530 for schools. Under the operation of this bill the first year she would receive $213,000. This is based upon the number of those who can read and write. The State of Georgia would receive $1,360,595, while the same State in the year 1880 raised $471,000. I do not need to read at greater length to show the hurtful operation of the adoption of the amendment. It would be manifestly impossible for these States immediately and for a considerable time to bear the amount of increased taxation which would be necessary in order that they might derive any benefit under the act if the amendment should prevail. I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. The suggestion I desired to make was in reference to the effect of the provision of the proposed amendment that no greater amount shall be paid under the bill to the several States and Territories than is expended by the several States and Territories. In the State of Oregon we have three different funds from which the schools are supported. One fund is paid through the State. It is derived from the management of the school fund, the sale of school lands. An annual tax is levied by the counties, and a considerable fund is raised in that manner. Then each school district lays an annual tax and raises a fund annually for the support of schools. I think by far the largest portion of the money used for the support of schools is raised in the manner suggested by the Senator from Delaware, by taxation in the school districts, which never goes into any State or county fund.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say to the Senator that all those sources of taxation are aggregated, and they are in the returns of the Bureau of Education, and make the sum total that by the provision of the bill must be at least one-third of the amount that is derived by the State from its appropriation the first year.

Mr. DOLPH. They should all be aggregated in any provision that may be adopted.

Mr. BLAIR. The States must, however, produce proof to the Government that they have actually expended this amount for the maintenance of common schools and satisfy the Government that it is so.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, from which this bill was reported, I am not quite content to let this matter pass over without some reply to the criticisms that have been made upon the bill and its language. They are not true. They do not import the fact. The bill is clear enough, although the suggestions of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] are an improvement to it. It is not deserving of the criticisms so far as its language is concerned which have been made upon it by the Senator from Kansas who first spoke. I have never before in the Senate heard it insisted with so much pertinacity that a law is to be construed by one single proviso in it, that its whole context is not to be taken into consideration. The bill is a very good bill. It expresses very clearly the purpose of the committee and the object in view, and a very slight verbal correction will make it as clear as even the criticism of the Senator from Kansas could make it.

The first section of the bill provides "that for ten years after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums," and the second year so and so. The second section provides "that such money shall annually be divided among and paid out to the several States and Territories." There can be no clearer language than that. The annual division and the annual payment is clearly expressed, and although the terms of the proviso in the eighth section might perhaps be subjected to some little criticism, still in view of the expression in the section "that the design of this act not being to establish a permanent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being," it is "provided that no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act," &c. The term "first five years of the operation of this act" is qualified time and again everywhere throughout the bill, in half a dozen places, as referring specifically to an annual division and an annual appropriation. There is nothing of truth in the criticism that has been made upon it so far as the correct construction of the bill is concerned. It would be easy enough to ascertain it.

In regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] who last spoke as to what there was in this amount of one-third, I wish to state that the proportion of one-third was made with reference to the annual production of these States in comparison with other States. It was made in reference to the amount of school tax fixed in the constitutions of some of these States, which was done when the States were reorganized and reconstructed, and became a constitutional provision, as it did in my own State. It was fixed by the committee with reference to the tables after a careful examination by intelligent men interested in this question in the North and in the South and everywhere, by the friends of education, as to the capacity of the States at this time to pay a larger sum, not because of any magic quality in a third, but because that more nearly named the proportion between the capacity of these States to educate and the needs of education in proportion to the amount of illiteracy in the States.

I do not think it could be improved by any of the Senators who have considered the question and proposed a half. If they had examined very closely into the tables, which show the relative tax-paying power of these States, they would find that they have paid and are paying liberally and equal to any other part of the United States, whether it be Kansas or anywhere else, when you consider the annual productive capacity and the actual net returns from production in the several States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. ALLISON. If I understand the amendment of the Senator from Indiana I intend to vote for it. I understand his proposition to mean that a State shall not receive aid from the General Government in any one year in a greater sum than it raises by taxation from its own people.

Mr. HARRISON. That it shall not receive any greater sum than it raised in the preceding year for school purposes, not including school buildings.

Mr. ALLISON. If that is the meaning of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana I am in favor of it. I am in favor of it for several reasons, the first and chief of which is that I think if we double the school fund in the States where illiteracy abounds in any one year, we furnish as much as can reasonably and economically be expended in those States. Take, for illustration, the State of Louisiana. I believe it has been stated on the floor that Louisiana raised for school purposes, all told, about $400,000 last year.

Mr. BLAIR. In 1881.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, in 1881. Now, under the pro rata found in the tables presented by the Senator from New Hampshire the State of Louisiana receives at once under this bill nearly $1,000,000 for school purposes the first year. Now, I submit to the gentlemen who have carefully prepared this bill that the sum of $1,000,000 can not be suddenly thrown into a State as large as the State of Louisiana for the purpose of educating the children of that State and be economically and prudently expended.

Mr. BLAIR. I will state to the Senator the precise sum upon the basis of those who can not write, as he will find it in table 23, on page 2208 of the RECORD, which is the table which indicates the exact distribution. The State of Louisiana would receive $767,295.80 upon that basis.

Mr. ALLISON. I have been misled then by table 22. By one table that is submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire I find upon the basis of the school population of 1881 Louisiana would receive $905,612.35. On the basis of the table to which he now calls my attention Louisiana would receive $767,295.80. Although the sums differ somewhat, the difference is not material to the argument which I make; and that is that if you suddenly throw into the rural districts of the State of Louisiana a sum more than twice the amount now raised in that State for educational purposes, it will not be economically expended. I have as my authority for this statement a letter placed in the RECORD by the Senator from New Hampshire himself, written by the superintendent of schools of that State, in which he says that the sum of $1,000,000 to be expended for educational purposes in the State of Louisiana would require 5,000 teachers, and I find on looking at other tables that there are in that State to-day less than 2,000 teachers.

Now in the nature of things is it probable that you can throw into the State of Louisiana in a single year twice the amount of money she now expends for educational purposes, and acquire the proper teachers, procure the proper school-houses and erect them in the various localities, and expend this money as it should be expended?

That brings me to another objection I have to this bill, if the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me, and that is that his scale is in the wrong direction. It ought to begin with a smaller sum and increase, and that is the inevitable tendency of this appropriation, whatever we may do. I remember only a few years ago I was in the other House when we established a bureau of education in the Interior Department. The appropriation, I believe, for the first year for that bureau was $5,000 or $6,000, I do not remember the exact sum.

Mr. BUTLER. About $3,000.

Mr. ALLISON. It has swelled annually until now it amounts to over $60,000, and there is a constant complaint from that bureau that we do not give them what they need for the purposes intended in the creation of the bureau, namely, the gathering of statistics of education in this country and in other countries. If I were to make the scale with reference to appropriations I should begin with the smaller sum, and if the appropriation is successful from year to year it should be increased as the States increase their appropriations.

Take the State of Louisiana again for illustration. She expended $400,000 in 1880, and that would be the basis of the expenditure of the next year. We give her $400,000 next year. That gives her for her school fund $800,000, a sum double what she had last year. Is not that enough? Is not that as much as she can economically expend? Then she is stimulated and next year appropriates, instead of $400,000, $500,000 or $600,000. Then the General Government gives her an equal sum so that she can gradually expand her schools. Is it expected by this bill that we are to educate all the people of this country in one year or five years or ten years? If we enter upon a system for the education of the colored race (and I believe we ought to enter upon it), it is a question of many years; and it will not end with the ten years involved in this bill.

Therefore it is, Mr. President, that I concur in the principle of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], because under that principle we shall be enabled to make a less appropriation now and enter on this experiment, and if it is successful we can from year to year increase and expand the appropriations. If his amendment is adopted the $15,000,000 should be stricken out and a sum necessary under the proposed amendment should be inserted in lieu of it. I do not know any reason why we should appropriate $15,000,000. I do not see why a smaller sum would not do if the amendment of the Senator from Indiana should be adopted. There is nothing cabalistic in these figures, $15,000,000.

Let us give this money to the States that need it if we are to give it at all. Why is it that Iowa is included in this bill? The State of Iowa appropriates and expends in that State for educational purposes nearly $6,000,000. She annually taxes her people nearly $5,000,000 for the purposes of education, and the amount that she is to receive I see under this bill will be less than $100,000. Is that any object to the State of Iowa?

If there is a reason why the General Government should enter upon this question that has been supposed hitherto to belong to the States, let it do it upon the plain reason that is given here in these speeches and in this bill, namely, on the ground of the great illiteracy in certain States of the Union arising from the situation of the colored race in those States. I think we are bound in reason to appropriate money from the general Treasury for the purpose of educating the colored people. I will not go into the history and situation of those people during the last few years. It is sufficient for me to know that many of those States can not raise by taxation a sufficient sum to educate these people properly, or at least I do not believe they can. Therefore I am willing to enter upon some system that will give aid to those States that can not themselves educate the colored race; but I see no reason why we should appropriate money here for the State of Massachusetts or the State of Connecticut or the State of New Hampshire.

I see a most singular thing in this bill, if the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to call his attention to it. It provides that in a State where the illiteracy is not over 5 per cent. the sum applicable to that State under this bill may be used for normal schools. Why put in that idea? It happens, of course as a matter of coincidence and accident, that the State of New Hampshire is the only State that has just 5 per cent. of illiterates. The State of Iowa, it is true, comes under the same category, because her illiteracy is less than 5 per cent. Therefore, in all these States, beginning with New Hampshire and running up to Iowa and Nebraska, we can use this money for normal schools for the purpose of educating teachers.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is under a misapprehension. I do not like to interrupt him, for I want to reply to him on several other points.

Mr. ALLISON. If I misapprehend the bill I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator misapprehends in this: The State is at liberty to use it precisely as she pleases. It is suggested that she may appropriate it all for that specific purpose. Otherwise she would be expected to distribute it among the scholars; and the amount being so small, this provision is made so that it may be as a body directed to the preparation of teachers.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. I understand that it is not compulsory; but the States where the illiteracy is not over 5 per cent. are permitted to use the money, not for the purposes of common-school education except indirectly in the way of normal schools. Now, my belief is that we ought to come square up to what we intend in this matter. It is the purpose and intention of this bill to aid the Southern States in educating the colored and the white illiterates in those States. If that be true and we have the constitutional power to do it, let us appropriate a reasonable sum for that purpose, and either assign it to the States or do it in some way under our authority and power. In my judgment there is no need to-day greater than the need of normal schools in the Southern States. We certainly have the power to establish normal schools there for the education of teachers out of the funds of the United States Treasury and to employ teachers and the machinery for these normal schools. That we can do. Why not do that?

This very bill provides that one-tenth of the sum appropriated in it may be used for normal schools in those States. If a million and a half of dollars of the $15,000,000 is found necessary for the purpose of educating school teachers in order to enable the people in the Southern States to teach their fellows, why not appropriate that money directly, and establish four or five normal schools in the different States of the South and have some method of admission whereby teachers shall be instructed to teach the children in the South? I do not believe myself that you can throw into those States these vast sums of money and find competent teachers at once who can enter upon the business of teaching the children. Therefore it is that I think we ought to make some special provision for normal schools, begin in that way, and from year to year increase the appropriation.

While I am up, Mr. President, I wish to say for one that I will not agree to bind succeeding Congresses by appropriations which shall run for ten years. We can trust the future Congresses to make the necessary appropriations to carry out what we initiate here without binding the Government for ten years in the way of making this permanent appropriation. We have, it is true, made permanent appropriations, but we never have made them except where the obligation was absolute and binding, such as to pay the interest on the debt of the United States, such as to pay the interest which we bound ourselves to pay in our Indian treaties, and so on. We have never entered upon a policy of making appropriations for more than one year for the general purposes of our Government. On that point a new policy is involved in this bill, and I think it is a dangerous one even for the success of the bill itself. If we want this money to be appropriated, let us do it from year to year, in order that there may be an ever-present reason for the appropriations We need not be afraid that these appropriations will grow less. If this method of teaching the people who are illiterate shall be successful, these appropriations, in the nature of things, will expand from year to year and grow greater, instead of less, as provided for in this bill.

Mr. GARLAND. We are just getting now into the interior of this bill; it is 5 o'clock; and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. We had better have an executive session.

Mr. GARLAND. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 20, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1314) to change the name of the James Sweet National Bank of Nebraska City, Nebr.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE—LEAVE TO PRINT.

The SPEAKER. The request is made on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary to have printed certain arguments made before the committee on the proposed sixteenth amendment to the Constitution.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

VIRGINIA CONTESTED ELECTION—GARRISON VS. MAYO.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I call up the contested-election case of Garrison vs. Mayo, from the first Congressional district of the State of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Robert M. Mayo was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress from the first Congressional district of Virginia, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That George T. Garrison was duly elected from the first Congressional district of Virginia, and is entitled to the seat.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I ask that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MAYO] be now heard.

Mr. MAYO. Mr. Speaker, I promised on yesterday to examine the report of the Committee on Elections and ascertain if in my judgment it was altogether correct, and if I so found it that I would state to the House that I believed it to be correct and ask for the adoption of these resolutions.

I have examined carefully this report, and I am free to say that if the act of the General Assembly of Virginia requiring the prepayment of a capitation tax as a prerequisite for voting is constitutional, with respect to the Constitution and laws of the United States and with respect to the constitution of the State of Virginia itself, then this report is correct. I can not make out within about six or seven votes that I am entitled to my seat after giving the votes I did before the committee to my competitor which he failed to get by reason of technicalities, amounting to about seventy, which were thrown out by the board of canvassers in Richmond.

But, Mr. Speaker, I not only believe but I feel absolutely certain that the act of the General Assembly of Virginia requiring this prerequisite is unconstitutional and void, and if the votes which were rejected because the persons giving them, who went to the precincts and offered to vote for me and who swore here that they were rejected on that account, had not complied with that law—if those votes are counted for me, then I am entitled to a seat on this floor by a majority of about seventeen.

I do not propose to discuss at length that constitutional question, because I believe that after a committee has been so unanimous in reporting as this committee has been, it would be an almost useless expenditure of time. But as this question will, in all probability, be before this House again in other cases from Virginia, I deem it my duty to say a few words here with respect to that matter. Before I go into that question, however, let me put myself right before this House, as I think I have been somewhat wronged by two of my colleagues from Virginia. The House will remember that from the very moment that I took my seat upon this floor it was contended that I was not even entitled to a prima facie seat here. Now, sir, let me say this much, not in my own vindication, but in vindication and justification of the board of canvassers of the State of Virginia.

That board is merely ministerial; the function it performs is simply to add up and subtract, and return who has the majority from the returns of votes received from the several counties. It can not send for witnesses; it can not take any testimony aliunde, but is bound by the returns that come to it from the different counties, provided those returns are made in the form required by law.

In the case of the vote of Gloucester County, according to the returns that came before that board, there was a majority of fifty-six for the contestant. That return, however, came before the board without the seal on it which was required by the law of the State of Virginia. The law of the State of Virginia requires that these returns shall be sealed with the seal of the county court. The return from Gloucester County, instead of being sealed with the seal of the county court, had had impressed upon the paper the seal or stamp of the circuit court, and then the word "circuit" was scratched out and the word "county" written above with a pen and ink.

Now with respect to that question of a seal let me read the law of the State of Virginia. The law provides that every court shall have a seal, and if any court has none the governor shall provide a seal. Then chapter 15, title 9, section 12, defines what shall constitute a seal, and is as follows:

In cases where the seal of any court or public office is required to be affixed to any paper issuing from such court or office, the word "seal" shall be construed to include the impression of such official seal made upon the paper alone, as well as an impression made by means of wafer or of wax affixed thereto.

Now, it is clear that nothing but the impression made by the seal, and that is the brass instrument furnished by the governor to the county court of Gloucester, could make valid any paper requiring that seal. It seems that the seal of the county court of Gloucester has worn out, and that, instead of applying to the governor for a new one, some person borrowed the seal of the circuit court, made its impression on the paper, then scratched over "circuit" and wrote "county" above it. This was clearly no seal at all, because it was partly impressed and partly written, and to give the clerk authority to write a part of the seal would be equivalent to abolishing the law requiring seals altogether.

I say, therefore, that it was proper for the canvassing board, this ministerial body, to have rejected that paper. It was not a lawful paper, and the board of canvassers had no other means of ascertaining what the vote of Gloucester was.

There was also another vote in a precinct belonging to the county of Northumberland, known as Hog Island, situated out in the Chesapeake Bay about fifteen miles from the mainland. That precinct gave fifteen votes to my competitor. The vote did not arrive at the county seat in time to be returned to Richmond. There was an attempt made afterward to get it there, but the secretary of the Commonwealth says that there never was any legal return from the Hog Island precinct, and therefore that vote was not counted. The board failing to count these seventy votes returned me by one majority. I have said this much in vindication of the action of that board.

It is contended that the governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia did not sign my certificate. He is one of the board of canvassers and only one; and he does not sign the certificates which he sends here. I send to the Clerk and ask him to read my certificate, and I call upon every member from Virginia to state whether it is not identically the same certificate that he and every other member from Virginia has had for the last fifty years.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA:

This is to certify that at a meeting of the board of State canvassers, held at the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth, the fourth Monday of November, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, on an examination of the official abstracts of votes on file in that office, it was ascertained and determined that, at an election of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, held pursuant to law, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, Robert M. Mayo was duly elected a Representative of this State in the Congress of the United States for the first Congressional district.

Given under my hand and seal of office, at Richmond, this twenty-ninth day of November, eighteen hundred and eighty-two.

[SEAL OF STATE OF VIRGINIA.] W. C. ELAM,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. MAYO. It has been said on this floor that the governor did not sign my certificate. That is the certificate, and he did not sign it. But here is the signature of the governor and the four other canvassers to the fact that I received 10,505 votes and that my competitor received 10,504 votes; thereby returning me by 1 majority.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. MAYO. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Just below that signature is another paper where the governor's signature does not appear.

Mr. MAYO. Underneath there his signature does not appear; why I do not know; I was not present. But it was too late for the governor to refuse his signature, because he had nothing to do with that. Here is the law of Virginia.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Let me interrupt him again.

Mr. MAYO. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. The certificate which the governor refused to sign is the certificate that he ought to have signed if he believed that you were elected.

Mr. MAYO. The question of the governor's signature does not matter here. There is one paper there to which it does not appear, but it appears in the preceding paper certifying that I received a majority of votes. I will read the law:

In all elections for the choice of any officer, unless it be otherwise expressly provided, the person having the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed to have been elected to such office.

There is the certificate of the governor and the others that I did receive the highest number of votes, and there is the law which says that having received the highest number of votes I am elected. The question whether or not he signed any other certificate is a question I know nothing about nor do I care. I was not present. But if he did so, it does not amount to anything. He was only one of the board of five commissioners, any three of whom had power to act; and for aught I know, or anybody else on this floor knows, there may have been but three commissioners sitting when the gentleman's certificate was signed; and his certificate may have been signed by only two of those three. Still he would be just as much entitled to a certificate and just as much entitled to a seat on this floor as any other member in this House, and he knows it. It is very frequently the case that only three members of the board sit. They determine by their majority who is entitled to the seat, and they certify that fact. There is the certificate that I did receive 10,505 and my competitor received only 10,504.

So much in vindication of myself upon the score of being a "fraud;" so much in vindication of the board that sat in Richmond, who, I believe, acted entirely in accordance with law and did what any legal man would have advised.

But, Mr. Speaker, let me say I did not expect to hold my seat on this floor upon any such title as that. I knew that this body had the right to go behind, and ought to go behind, these technicalities to ascertain exactly who was entitled to the seat; and long before this board had reported I had ascertained the fact that a sufficient number of votes actually offered to be cast for me had been rejected to entitle me to be regarded as having received a majority of the votes actually cast at that election. Therefore I went to work as soon as the contest began and took my evidence, which I have brought before this body. It is true that some of this evidence, owing to the fact that there were few able lawyers in our party, is badly taken, and the committee were perfectly right in rejecting it. If it had been properly taken, I would not have been obliged to raise this constitutional question; but it would have been apparent to every one that I was entitled to my seat by about seventeen majority, as set forth in the brief which is on the desks of members.

But, sir, I come back to the position taken by these honorable gentlemen from Virginia, these so-called Democrats here on the floor of this House, bearing the names of illustrious men, as they do, the fathers of the Democracy of Virginia, such men as Henry A. Wise and John Randolph. Men bearing such names get up before this House and put their puny and insignificant words against the seal of their own State! Shades of the immortal Wise and Randolph, what think you of such Democracy as that? Yet these same gentlemen, who in this case ignore the seal of their own native State, disgrace and trample it under their feet, when their own man was to be sworn in, a man who did not even claim his seat, urged that the seal of Mississippi was good to seat him, although the seal of the poor old mother State of Virginia was not good to seat me. That is Democracy! That is fairness and justness, is it not, to seat your man upon the very ground that you refuse to recognize as good when my seat is in question? Why is this? Because I happen to belong to that poor thing known in Virginia as the Radical Republican party. It is not because, as you say, of anything personal to myself; but it is just such an attack made on my party through me as the representatives of that so-called Democracy in Virginia made in its Legislature when they deliberately turned out without cause, without a hearing before any committee, fifteen senators and representatives, in order to obtain a two-thirds majority to pass bills over the veto of the governor—deliberately keeping out men who had been elected, sending back some to be elected twice; and one man, a senator, presented three certificates before he was allowed to take his seat upon the floor of the senate.

In the mean time they passed laws over the veto of the governor, most of which were passed to give them the absolute control of the ballot-box, in order that they might do as they pleased with it in the coming election. Why this violent attack upon me and my party and men who hold the position that I do? Why, Mr. Speaker, because I believe the war is over, and I am trying to teach my children and my neighbor's children that the war is over; because I say that the proudest thing I have to boast of is that I did my duty as a soldier in the confederate army under the greatest chieftain that America has ever produced—Stonewall Jackson—and I am not ashamed of it; but at the same time I believe and say that when the history of that great revolution is written, two of the greatest names that will go sounding down the corridors of time will be those of Abraham Lincoln and Stonewall Jackson—much alike in their character and persons—tender of heart yet stern and unflinching when they believed that they were right; the one giving up his life a martyred President to the cause of a great Union which he had restored, the other giving up his in the cause that he believed right—the cause of his native State when she called him to the front. Each in the cause which he believed it his duty to follow did his duty as he saw it best.

Each wrought with God's supreme designs,
And under love's eternal law
Each life with equal beauty shines.

To teach such doctrines, to say that I rejoice that the Union is restored, that the curse of African slavery is abolished (that eternal thorn in the side of the Union), is treason down South, and I am called a deserter after the war! Any man who takes a position down there now that I have taken, although so many years after the war, has to face precisely the same consequence which I have had to contend against; and when I happened to vote as I did here for a Union soldier for Speaker of this House I was told they were exceedingly surprised I should here in this Hall vote for a man who had gone down South to whip me. That is the spirit that animates the fight in Virginia. That is the spirit that has brought about the state of things whereby my native State has been disgraced in the eyes of the outer world.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Virginia are not murderers, the people of Virginia do not deliberately go to work to kill anybody, whether white or colored, but in order to work out their purpose a political party in Virginia did array one class against another upon a false issue until strife was stirred up in the hearts of the ignorant white people on the one side and ignorant colored people on the other, so that in many places they believed there was going to be an actual outbreak of civil war. Those gentlemen, in order to carry out their political purposes, did this thing, but not intentionally to stir up murder. These gentlemen do not look like cut-throats, they do not look like people who would foment a disturbance such as that which occurred at Danville intentionally, but when they preached the doctrine that the party to which I belonged meant to have mixed marriages and mixed schools in Virginia, they excited the poorer class of people in my country to such an extent that in most places, the places where there was a majority of colored people, such a disturbance as that at Danville might have broken out. It was wrong for them to have done this because they ought to have known we had no such intention, they ought to have known that we preached the docrine that the negro question was settled, that the Republican party could give him no more rights than he had, while the Democratic party said they did not intend to take any away from him. Therefore, sir, it was settled, and settled forever. As long as they could keep alive that feeling, just so long that party would remain as the white party of Virginia and have a large majority of the people. That is the trouble and that has brought about this strife; and I feel it to be my duty on this floor to say to you that the people of Virginia are not cold-blooded murderers.

I am happy also to say in reference to my own case that I do not believe in the annals of the world there ever was a fairer election. I do not believe there was probably more than one or two votes that were fraudulently cast on either side intentionally. That mistakes will be made is very natural; that mistakes will be made on the side of the party that may have the majority of the people and they will lean a little to their own side is also very natural. But outside of that there never was a fairer election than that held in the case of Mr. Garrison and myself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have wandered off rather too far from the question I have proposed to discuss. I come now to this question: Is the act of the General Assembly of Virginia imposing a capitation tax of $1.05 as a prerequisite for voting unconstitutional—first, with respect to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and the reconstruction acts passed in pursuance thereof; and, secondly, if not, is it unconstitutional in respect to the Constitution of the United States itself?

Mr. COOK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MAYO. Certainly.

Mr. COOK. Do you claim in this report any votes were deducted from you or you were deprived of any votes in consequence of the capitation tax?

Mr. MAYO. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOK. Is it not true that the report expressly ignores that subject and confines the case against you on other grounds, and that you were deprived of no votes on account of payment of the capitation tax?

Mr. MAYO. I will say the report does so state, but when you come to look at the figures the figures do not show that. The figures show there were certain votes of persons not assessed outside with this capitation tax and who offered to vote but whose votes were rejected. If it had not been for a question of law there would have been no necessity for their assessment and therefore they would have been allowed to vote. Give me those, and in addition if I get the votes you do reject because of the insufficiency of evidence in the case on that question, I believe it will foot up to about 17 majority for me.

Mr. COOK. If all those votes were counted for you would you receive a majority of the votes?

Mr. MAYO. Yes; I would. Give me the votes placed in the ballot-boxes, which the counsel on the other side admitted I was entitled to—give me those votes and give me the votes rejected which offered to vote and were refused, and I think it will be seen I am entitled to about 17 majority.

Now, sir, let us see what the law is. Here is the reconstruction act passed in pursuance of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States when Virginia was admitted into the Union:

The constitution of Virginia shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized, except, &c.

Now, it has been contended that the requirement of the prepayment of $1 as a prerequisite for the privilege of voting is not a restriction upon the right of suffrage contemplated by this act. But, Mr. Speaker, it is manifest if they had a right to say that this prerequisite should be $1, had not they an equal right, on the same principle of reasoning, to say that it should be $5, or $10, or $500? Had not they a right to say that it should be five hundred acres of land, or make any other property qualification that they might see proper to devise? The intent of this law was to prevent exactly what was done in Virginia. It was in its inception and origin a scheme to get around the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. There is not an honest man in Virginia of any intelligence whatever who will deny the fact that this law was passed purely and solely for the purpose of getting around the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. But that does not appear upon its face, say the supporters of this act; that that was not the intention as shown by the act itself. That is true, for it makes no exception with reference to color; it applies to white and black and rich and poor alike; it is the same to all. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it must be brought down to this provision of the reconstruction constitution which says that no change shall be made in that constitution with reference to this right of suffrage; and that question is the very one to be decided here by this body, not by the courts, because it was upon the adoption of that provision that this body admitted the representatives from Virginia upon this floor, and only upon its adoption. They were admitted upon the solemn assurance of the constitution of the State of Virginia that this right of suffrage should remain unchanged forever, and that no alteration of the constitution in that respect would be permitted. And yet she has done so by the passage of this law to which I have called attention, and for the express object of getting around the fourteenth amendment, under which her representatives were admitted upon this floor.

Now that matter is discussed fully in this brief, which has been distributed among the members of this House, and the authorities are fully cited. I shall not, therefore, take up the time of the House by going through them in this discussion. But it strikes me, I may be permitted to repeat, that if they had the right to make this prerequisite $1 they had the same right to make it anything whatever, and they might have carried it to the extent of depriving half the people of the State of the right to vote.

Let us see how far it is unconstitutional with respect to the constitution of the State of Virginia. This act of the General Assembly of the State requires the prepayment of $1.05 before a man shall vote, the 5 cents being added by way of penalty for non-payment of the tax. The constitution of Virginia expressly says that where a party has paid his capitation tax of $1 prior to the day of election he shall have the right to vote.

Now, 5 cents may be a small matter; but if the Legislature of Virginia have the right to add 5 cents as a penalty they had the right to add $5. The principle is just the same. Admit the right of the State to change that law in any respect from the prerequisite of $1 and you give them the right to go behind the constitution and change it in any way they please by adding any amount they choose. That position I have never heard disputed as a constitutional question, and I do not believe it can be gainsaid. There is no power in the Legislature to fix the prerequisite of $1.05 in order that the voter may have the right to vote when the constitution itself limits the amount expressly to $1.

Now, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish in a few words to thank this House and especially the Committee on Privileges and Elections for the courtesy and kindness with which they have considered this case and the fairness and justice with which I think they have acted throughout. In addition let me say that I am exceedingly sorry that it should have happened that the only gentlemen who seem peculiarly anxious to get rid of me were those from my own State.

I thank you, gentlemen.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. RANNEY. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not ask the previous question until I shall have had an opportunity of saying a few words.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. RANNEY. About fifteen minutes.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I shall endeavor to yield to the gentleman such time as he requires after the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. After the previous question has been ordered the Chair will state there can be no debate upon the resolution.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I shall yield, then, to the gentleman for fifteen minutes.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not insist upon the previous question until the gentleman from Massachusetts has been heard. While the committee are substantially unanimous in their resolution, still they do not entirely agree upon the wording of the report submitted by the majority of the committee.

Mr. RANNEY. Mr. Speaker, it is true, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Elections, that the committee was unanimous in recommending the adoption of the resolution appended to the report of the committee. Mr. Mayo, the sitting member in this contest, only claimed before the committee a majority of 17 votes; and by the most favorable and liberal construction possible upon the evidence and upon the case as presented by himself it is impossible to find that he was elected, but, on the contrary, there is a clear majority of at least 4 votes against him.

I do not desire to go into the detail of that evidence. I wish, however, to say that while there is no minority report in this case, the committee do not sanction the report as made by the chairman. We sanction only the resolutions which are appended to it; and he alone, so far as I know, is responsible for the statements contained in the report. But inasmuch as that report may hereafter be treated as a precedent and do injustice to the other members of the committee, I desire to place upon record our dissent from many of its positions. I have reduced it to writing, but in justice I think I ought to state the substance of it, that the learned chairman of the Committee on Elections and the House may understand what the grounds of our dissent are.

In the first place, I think the report puts the sitting member and some officials in Virginia in a wrong attitude. The gentleman has stated, I think, in language which is designed, if not intended, to be a censure perhaps upon the sitting member and upon the returning board in this respect, that the return from Gloucester County giving the contestant fifty-seven majority came to the canvassing board with a seal which had been altered and which was not the seal of the proper court, and the returning board rejected the return; and they have been charged with improper conduct in relation to it, and this report relieves from censure the governor, but leaves under censure, apparently, the others.

Now, sir, that matter was referred to the Committee on Elections, and there is a report before the House which has not been acted upon relating to the prima facie case which deals with that question, and I do not care to discuss it. I will simply say, however, that the officers who judged of that return had to perform in the main merely ministerial duties; but their duty was judicial so far as this: they were bound to determine the genuineness and authenticity of that return, and it was the wrong seal of a wrong court and not the regular seal of a regular court as required by law, and it came to them altered; the impression of wax altered in ink. And now, sir, without attempting to determine the question whether those judges determined rightfully or wrongfully, I say they were in that respect acting in a judicial capacity, and were bound to determine the genuineness and authenticity of that return. The majority of the committee have reported upon it, and the committee have not found that there was anything like fraud or anything that savored of fraud on the part of any of those gentlemen who refused to count that return; and it ought to be understood and ought to be placed before the House in its proper aspect.

But the majority report leaves open the implication of a concession on the part of the contestee that may work a reflection. It says he concedes the votes from Gloucester County should be counted. He does so concede, but not on the ground that the returning officers or the canvassing board were in error or were guilty of any fraud or any improper conduct, because the evidence in the case showed conclusively, going behind those returns, independent of the returns—aliunde, as the lawyers say—what the vote actually cast and counted was; and it is on the strength of the evidence that the concession is made. And the concession made by the contestee before the committee was not that the returning board did wrong or were guilty of any fraud or any improper conduct, but on the strength of the evidence which went behind that return and stood independent of the return and showed what the vote actually was. I think in that respect the report of the chairman does injustice. I objected to it and object to it now. It is not properly stated; it is unwittingly perhaps, not intentionally, misrepresented. But it is due in justice to the sitting member to say that he has not come in here and claimed and obtained and held the seat to this time on any concession on his part that he held it on the strength of fraud. I think the returning board erred in rejecting that return.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that I have taken any such position? I have not.

Mr. RANNEY. I did not say the gentleman intended to take any such position; but his report, inadvertently perhaps, is so drawn that it leaves it open for that implication, because he says it is fair to the governor to say that he had not sanctioned that action; which implies he was right and the others were wrong. Relieving the one from the censure implies the others are subject to it. I do not agree to that.

The argument before the committee shows that the returning board who rejected that return followed the bad precedent in Virginia set by the opponents. That is the only thing in relation to it.

There is one other fact, sir. I call the gentleman's attention to the case of Charles Yeatman. He is shown to have voted for the contestant twice, once fraudulently. The report so finds. The report, however, proceeds to state and leaves it open to the implication that the evidence offered was not competent or sufficient to show how he voted. I do not agree to the report in that respect. I do not propose to discuss it. But it will be argued hereafter, as establishing a precedent or a ruling in a matter of law which may possibly become very important in a case which may hereafter be presented to the House. I can not therefore allow the report to go on record without dissent in that respect, while it would carry an implication possibly that the committee unanimously held that the evidence offered there was not competent evidence or even sufficient; because that question is held open and never has been discussed by the committee in this case and has never been acted upon, and no one so far as I know assented to that position in the report.

One other matter: In Essex County there were thirty votes offered at the polls by voters who desired to vote for the contestee, and they were rejected on the ground that the election officers were not satisfied that the capitation tax had been paid in their cases. That raises an important question, which will come before the House in another case. I hold, and I desire to so state now, that those votes should have been received, and that they were wrongfully rejected. I do not want any implication to be made from this report which the House can hereafter use as a precedent to the contrary; and I think my associates on the committee do not want it.

There is another question that there possibly may be some error about. At this election there were two ballot-boxes, one to receive ballots on a question of constitutional amendment and another to receive ballots for members of Congress. There were found in the box to receive the ballots on the constitutional amendment thirty-three ballots for member of Congress. The precinct officers refused to count those ballots for Mr. Mayo, they having been cast for him. They rejected them, and returned that fact to the county canvassing board.

The report of the committee says that it does not appear that the county canvassing board did not include those ballots in the result. I do not agree with that statement in the report. The precinct officers counted the votes and made the returns, rejecting these votes found in the wrong box, and accompanied their return to the county officers with a statement to that effect. This report says that it may be that the county canvassing board counted those votes; that it is not shown that they did not. I dissent as a matter of law entirely from that proposition. I say that the canvassing board were simply ministerial officers; they had no right to go behind the return made by the precinct officers and try the question of fact whether those votes in the wrong box were put there by the innocent mistake of the voter or by the fraud or error of the election officer. The presumption is not that they counted them or might have counted them, but that they did their duty and did not count them.

Without any evidence on the subject I say the case stands before this House as one where those votes were rejected; and if the question is presented as a matter of law whether they should have been counted, then the sitting member received thirty-one votes which were not counted for him. There is some doubt as to two of the votes, and therefore I put the number at thirty-one.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANNEY. Do not interrupt me now. I am nearly done, and when I am through I will answer any question.

In the case of Cook vs. Cutts, decided by the last House, this question was discussed and decided by the House. If I should follow the precedent set in that case then I should count these votes for the sitting member. But I do not follow it; I do not yield to it as a matter of law, but protest against it now here and shall always, although all of the other side of the House, and I am sorry to say twenty on this side, decided against me.

The law is this: that in such a case you can not count such votes unless a satisfactory explanation is made to show that they were put into the wrong box by the mistake of the voter or by the error or fraud of the election officer. It would not do to hold otherwise, because a fraudulent voter might put a vote for member of Congress in the box to receive such ballots and then might step right along and put another vote for a member of Congress into the box to receive the ballots on the constitutional amendment; for it is a vote by secret ballot and no one can tell what the character of the vote is. In that way two votes for a member of Congress might be given by one voter.

The law therefore will not presume a mistake or fraud, and those votes can not be safely counted unless there is proof explanatory of the fact, showing that they were put into the wrong box by the innocent mistake of the voter or by the error or fraud of the election officer for the purpose of depriving an honest voter of his vote. This House at the last session solemnly adjudicated to the contrary; but it is a bad precedent, and I decline for one to follow it. If, however, that precedent is to be followed, then 31 of these vbtes should be counted for Mr. Mayo. I hold that it should not be followed, and therefore I refuse to count them, because there is no satisfactory explanation.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Was there a tally-sheet kept?

Mr. RANNEY. One moment. I say there is no evidence to explain those votes, to show that the number of ballots counted for members of Congress, including those votes in the wrong box, did not exceed the number of names on the poll-list. In the case of two of the ballots it appears that two ballots on the constitutional amendment were found in the box for Congressional ballots, showing that there was an exchange of two votes; that the men put the wrong ballots into the wrong boxes. That is an explanation in regard to two of the ballots, and I would count those two. But there is no explanation in regard to the others, and I refuse to count them. I wish to put myself on record as protesting against the statement made in the report of the majority, and to assert what I believe is the law of the case and what should be adhered to hereafter.

But, sir, in this case if you count for Mr. Mayo the 31 votes rejected, the votes found in the wrong box, the result is not changed. Allowing to the full extent all these matters to which I have referred, urged on behalf of Mr. Mayo, I can not without straining the law and violating my duty as a judicial officer find that Mr. Mayo was elected. Allowing all these things claimed on his behalf, adopting the extreme view on that side, he is still left in a minority by 4 votes. On his own showing I can not find that he is elected. I have found against him because, acting in a judicial capacity, I can not afford to come to any other conclusion.

There have been raised on behalf of the contestant important questions of constitutional law which require for their determination great consideration, questions in regard to the capitation tax, the law requiring that tax to be paid, and the legality of that tax. If we had not found as we have upon this claim of the contestee it would have been necessary to go into those questions, and they would have raised a very interesting and grave discussion. But we did not find it necessary in this case to pass upon them. They will come up in subsequent cases, but there is no use of discussing them now.

I have said this much for the reason that otherwise it might have been inferred that the majority of the committee have yielded to what my esteemed friend from Georgia, who means to be a fair man, has put into the report, but which, with all respect to him, is in my judgment erroneous.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman now permit a question?

Mr. RANNEY. I will.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understood the gentleman to say that a number of votes which were offered in Essex County were rejected, and as the gentleman from Massachusetts thought, improperly rejected.

Mr. RANNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If those votes had been permitted to be cast, would the sitting member have been elected?

Mr. RANNEY. Mr. Speaker, I have already undertaken to answer that question. It is proved that 31 votes in Essex County, which were offered to be cast, would have been cast for Mr. Mayo; but the precinct officers refused to receive them, because the tax receipts of the persons offering to vote, which were competent evidence that the taxes had been paid, were signed by a man named Meaney; and the precinct officers said, "We do not know that this man is an officer; we do not recognize him as such, and we will not accept his certificates." Therefore they rejected those votes, though according to the evidence the man who signed those tax receipts was a properly authorized tax-collector, had given bond as such, had discharged his duties, and these taxes had actually been paid either by the voters themselves or in their behalf, with their acceptance and sanction; so that the precinct officers were bound to take judicial notice of the fact of this collector's appointment and of the fact that he did collect the money for those taxes and did rightfully give the receipts. But, sir, in coming to my conclusion upon this case I do count those 31 rejected votes for Mr. Mayo, I count the votes which were put into the wrong box, and I say that even then the sitting member falls short of an election by at least 4 votes. In my judgment no fair-minded man, no man acting in a judicial capacity, can possibly in the conscientious discharge of his duty find otherwise, however much he might be inclined to do so, if he had any inclination outside of his duty.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I had intended that this debate, so far as I was concerned, should terminate with the argument of the sitting member. I confess to the small vanity of an effort to have the report in this case printed in the RECORD and to have gentlemen supplied with such information as the report might impart before the case should be decided. But my honorable and learned associate [Mr. RANNEY] interposed his objection, and that weak scheme failed. He now labors under the difficulty of arraigning a report which is not before the House. If there is a seeming absurdity in the gentleman's position, he is responsible for it—not I.

Mr. RANNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will.

Mr. RANNEY. I would like to know whether these objections which I have just indicated in my remarks were not called to his attention before the report was submitted and whether he was not requested to withhold his views so that we might agree on a report.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I answer the first part of the gentleman's question in the affirmative and the last in the negative. I never agreed to change my conclusions to conform to the gentleman's views.

Mr. RANNEY. I did not say you agreed to do so, but that you were asked to do it and did not.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The gentleman did ask me; I declined then and I decline now. On the issues between the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts and myself, either in this case or any other which is to come before the House, I am willing to stand by my convictions against him or any other comer, so far as I am able.

Mr. RANNEY. I do not object to your standing on your convictions, but I wish to be allowed to stand on mine.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. But the difficulty with my honorable friend, if I may be allowed to state it, is that he wants to cross a certain bridge before we get to it. If he desires to fight battles which are hereafter to take place over the Virginia cases or any other cases, I tell him frankly that on some of the issues involved in those cases I desire to reserve my judgment for fuller consideration. And when I do come to a decision on them I intend to announce the decision as the result of careful and painstaking investigation. I do not intend by criticisms to be goaded into premature commitments upon questions of the gravest character. I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts himself had been equally prudent.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has indulged himself in criticism of the report in one respect to which I now intend to advert. He charges that the report which I had the honor to submit contains an implied censure of the board of State canvassers of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the report is vulnerable to criticism here, I know it very well, but it is vulnerable to criticism not for what it does say but for what it does not say. Since I have been provoked to it by the honorable gentleman I desire to put on record my everlasting contempt for the pettifogging scheme by which the return of Mr. Mayo was consummated by the board of State canvassers of Virginia. [Applause on the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. Speaker, from the bottom of my heart I desired the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Mayo] to go forth in his hour of defeat without the sting of a single bitter recollection, so far as I am concerned. But I can not forbear now to say that since the month of March, 1883, this gentleman whom I will not otherwise reproach has drawn his pay and held his high distinction as a member of this House solely as the appointee of the board of State canvassers.

Mr. RANNEY. I should like to ask whether there is not a majority report of the committee sanctioning his holding office—whether there is not such a prima facie report on record?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts asks me a question which he knows would involve an inquiry into the divisions of that committee.

Mr. RANNEY. No; I only ask about a report on record made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] in favor of Mr. Mayo on a prima facie case.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I admit the gentleman from Massachusetts agreed to a report which presented that question to the House. And I admit, Mr. Speaker, that some of my colleagues of the committee, concluding that they were not authorized by the resolution of the House to go beyond the face of the certificate, reported in favor of what the gentleman terms the prima facie case of Mr. Mayo. And that is all there is of that matter.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] I know has held all the time that this action of the State board of Virginia was not a fraud. I regret again this question has been raised. I see honorable gentlemen from Virginia around me who are concerned in the fair fame of that ancient Commonwealth.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I do not know whether I shall have an opportunity, unless I ask for it now, to reply to what the gentleman is saying about the board of State canvassers of the State of Virginia. While I do not desire to indulge in any general debate, I do want extended to me the courtesy and privilege of replying very briefly, certainly not longer than five minutes, to what has been said.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Let the gentleman from Virginia take his five minutes now.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Thank you, sir. Now, Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman of the Committee on Elections for permitting me to reply to his strictures on that State board of canvassers. I have a contest pending in this House, but from the day I took my seat here and until that contest is decided I will speak out in meeting regardless of consequences. If I am turned out, why, let it go. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Georgia has said here that the action of this State board of canvassers of Virginia in this case excited his contempt as a pettifogging scheme. I wish to tell that gentleman where the precedent for this action came from.

In the year 1874 an election was held in the State of Virginia in which the candidates were John Goode, a Democrat, and James H. Platt, a Republican. A Democratic State board, composed of a Democratic governor and all of the other officers upon it being Democrats, met to canvass the returns of that election, and this was the state of affairs: By the returns there filed, in the first place James H. Platt was clearly elected by nearly 400 majority. But when the returns were sent up those from the county of Prince George were improperly certified. This had been discovered before the day the board met for canvassing the returns and the informal returns were supplemented by another which was in due form and the proper attestation appended. That State board of canvassers, every one of them Democrats, refused to consider the formal return from Prince George County, confined themselves exclusively to the informal return, and threw out the informal return, giving the seat to John Goode, the Democrat. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He came here and took his seat, unquestioned, upon the certificate. The contest came on, and the Democratic committee of the House of Representatives took the case and made a report to this House that the State board of canvassers had erred when they rejected the return from Prince George County. Mr. Thompson, a Democrat from Massachusetts and member of the committee, declared that to seat John Goode under such circumstances would be to sanction and perpetuate a fraud upon the contestant's rights unparalleled in the partisan rulings of the House. The Democratic Elections Committee of the House reported that Goode was not entitled to the seat; and what was the result? The Democratic House refused to sustain the report of its own committee. A minority resolution seating Goode was adopted, Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH TUCKER, of Virginia, voting against the majority report, and Mr. SPRINGER, of Illinois, the very two gentlemen who not only tried in this case to turn Mr. Mayo out, but attacked his prima facie certificate the first day of the session at the organization of this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

When the gentleman from Georgia talks about pettifogging precedents, let me say to him that the root and origin of this action of the State canvassers was in a Democratic board in the State of Virginia; and this last board did nothing more and nothing less than what had been done before and what had been sanctioned by the Democratic House in the face of a report of their own committee. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I expect to vote to unseat Mr. Mayo, because no partisan considerations, no question of expediency, no bias of affection for him, and no abuse which may be heaped upon me can make me forget the fact that I have sworn to do justice between these contestants, and I believe Mr. Garrison received the largest vote. But I say to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia that there was no occasion for going so far in his aspersions upon this board, and I felt it necessary to defend them, knowing them to be honorable men, who believe their action to be right, and who are the peers of any gentleman upon this floor. They were acting upon a state of facts which they had to meet and pass upon judicially; and while I always disagreed with their decision, they certainly followed a precedent, and no man has a right to question their motives in the absence of any proof whatever that they were corrupt, nor was such criticism necessary to sustain the report.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will resume the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I must confess my regret——

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me a single instant?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. TUCKER. Only a moment.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, it has pleased the contestee in this case and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. WISE, who has just addressed the House to lug my name into this discussion and to do it in a manner that, as I suppose, is intended to emphasize my former convictions upon a contest injuriously before the House——

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Let me interrupt the gentleman. I do not desire to do anything injuriously to him. If the gentleman has been inconsistent it is legitimate, it seems to me, to point it out. Nothing that I have said is calculated to do the gentleman an injury, unless by his own inconsistency he has injured himself. That is all that I said.

Mr. TUCKER. I will take care of myself.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Very well.

Mr. TUCKER. The transient member from Virginia had better look out for himself. [Laughter.]

When the time comes, sir, I am ready, as I have been ever ready, to vindicate, as I did vindicate in the Goode and Platt contest, the ground upon which I voted for Mr. Goode's retaining his seat. And there were grounds which were satisfactory to my own sense of right. But I am not to be twitted in the House, and in the manner that it is attempted here to be done, by the gentleman who is about to lose his own seat and who last spoke upon the subject, as if I had done a thing unworthy of the position I hold upon the floor of this House.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I repudiate the suggestion. I made no such statement.

Mr. TUCKER. I voted for the seating of John Goode not upon the question of the returns of the election at all. My recollection now is that the returns in that case were not similar in any respect to the one now before this House; that a different question was presented, and the case came before us in a different aspect. My vote in that case was predicated upon a question involving the validity of the election itself; that John Goode was elected, and the only ground of conflict was with reference to the facts in connection with the vote from the Norfolk navy-yard, that had been drilled and forced to vote by the power of the executive government here. That was the ground upon which I voted then.

But I did not intend to be forced into a discussion of this case. I thought, as the committee were unanimous in their conclusion, that there would be no discussion upon it.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question: If within the last five years the Democratic party——

Mr. TUCKER. I have not the right to let the gentleman ask me a question or to answer it in the time my friend from Georgia has given me.

Mr. BELFORD. That is all good.

Mr. TUCKER. All perfectly good. I would be glad, if I could, to satisfy the sunny gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I regret that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] to whom I yielded a part of my time saw proper to conclude his remarks by charging me with throwing aspersions on the board of State canvassers.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Yes; I regarded it as such.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I was arraigned here, Mr. Speaker, for having faintly alluded to the fact that on a certain ground the canvassers of Virginia had excluded the return of the county of Gloucester. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] claimed that from the context that was an indictment of these gentlemen which necessarily called forth a reply on my part. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Virginia has added to the arraignment of the gentleman from Massachusetts the charge that I have aspersed his friends in Virginia, allow me to state the facts.

Mr. Speaker, it was the duty of the clerk of the county court of Gloucester County to certify to the State board the election return from that county. The person who held this office was also clerk of the circuit court, and having no seal for the county court he used the seal of the circuit court, impressing the seal upon the paper, and over the word "circuit" in the seal thus impressed he wrote the word "county." On that ground the return was excluded. In this way a majority of 56 for the contestant was converted into a majority of 1 for Mr. Mayo. And after that was done the chief magistrate of that proud Commonwealth—proud, I regret to say, chiefly on account of her traditions—refused to certify as the result of that scheme the election of Mr. Mayo.

I have now, Mr. Speaker, stated the facts without using adjectives or epithets on my part, and if the facts asperse the gentleman's friends he must blame the facts and not me.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I referred to your language.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. One word more and I dismiss this subject. I have been drawn into this debate against my wish. My instincts were against it because the resolutions we reported here represented the unanimous action of the committee. Nobody, so far as I can learn, is disposed to vote against the resolutions, and therefore I deprecated debate and desired none. But, sir, since the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE] has seen fit to characterize my remarks as aspersive of the State canvassers, I feel it due to myself and due to the country to add that this scheme under which a whole county was disfranchised was conceived and executed by officers representing a party whose chief slogan was "a free ballot and a fair count." [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions reported by the committee.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I ask that the gentleman from Virginia be now sworn in.

Mr. GEORGE D. GARRISON appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1757 of the Revised Statutes.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to submit a privileged report. I present the unanimous report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill 4971, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, and 6, and agree to the same.

J. WARREN KEIFER,
WM. H. FORNEY,
E. JNO. ELLIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
M. W. RANSOM,
WILKINSON CALL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the statement accompanying the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The members on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Military Academy appropriation bill for 1885 submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment 1: Inserts the following: "For pay of treasurer, quartermaster, and commissary of cadets, in addition to pay as captain of infantry, $700."

On amendment 3: Strikes out provision for additional pay to officers on increased rank for length of service.

On amendments 4 and 5: Strikes out the following: "For extra pay of enlisted man employed in the care and preservation of models, &c. (in lieu of extra-duty pay), $120;" and corrects the total stated in a paragraph.

On amendment 6: Appropriates $5,000 for completion of cadet hospital.

On amendment 8: Appropriates $2,000 for additional bath-tubs and repairs to bath-tubs.

The bill as agreed upon appropriates $314,563.50, being $1,120 less than as it passed the Senate, $5,700 more than as it passed the House, and $4,094 less than the appropriations for 1884.

J. WARREN KEIFER,
WM. H. FORNEY,
E. JNO. ELLIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. I think it is not necessary to enter upon any general discussion of these amendments. The first amendment of the Senate provides for the pay of the treasurer, quartermaster, and commissary of cadets, in addition to pay as captain of infantry, $700. It appears that this officer was not paid in addition to the ordinary pay allowed him in the Army.

By this amendment of the Senate he is simply put on the same footing with other officers serving at the Military Academy. It is fair to him to say that he perhaps performs more responsible duties than any other one officer there. He is the custodian of the property, and has charge of the funds, disbursing them, and in every sense is responsible for all of the moneys paid out, and keeps the accounts himself.

Mr. REAGAN. Is not the service he is required to perform easier service than that in the field, and is not a position at West Point much preferred by officers of that rank to service in the field?

Mr. KEIFER. I think I can answer that question satisfactorily. While it may be true that officers prefer service at West Point, and are desirous of obtaining positions there, yet they are unable with their ordinary pay to accept service there and discharge all the duties that are essential for the maintaining of their positions. I think this officer ought not to be excepted from the rule that applies to other officers at the academy; especially as he has a large financial responsibility. The committee of conference agree that this amendment of the Senate should be incorporated in the bill Amendment No. 3 of the Senate is to strike out the words "and to officers on increased rank." It was believed that those words might affect the pay of officers who were obtaining pay on account of their length of service. It may turn out that they were superfluous words in the bill; at all events the conference committee recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to that amendment.

The House is also asked to recede from its disagreement to amendment No. 6 of the Senate, which provides the sum of $5,000 for the completion of the new hospital for cadets. The hospital was authorized to be built a number of years ago, and an appropriation was made for the purpose. It is not yet so far completed as to be capable of being occupied in case there shall be occasion for it. I am glad to say that my inquiry shows that there is very little necessity for a hospital for cadets at the Military Academy. There is rarely ever any sick cadet there who has to be treated in the hospital. Accidents occasionally occur by which limbs are broken, in consequence of the drill, especially the drill on horseback; but there are not many of those accidents. As we have the hospital there nearly completed, it was thought well to finish it, and this sum is recommended for that purpose.

It is also agreed that the Senate shall recede from its amendment No. 4, to give the small sum of $120 additional pay to an enlisted man while employed in the care and preservation of materials there. The Senate amendment proposed to give for the next fiscal year $120 as extra-duty pay to a private soldier employed for this purpose. The reason why the members of the conference committee and of the Committee on Appropriations of the House thought it was not wise to do so is that if we enter upon the policy of paying an extra sum to this one person, that fact may be used for the benefit of others who do not get extra pay for extra duty. Senate amendment No. 5 is a mere alteration of the amount in consequence of inserting the $120 put on by the Senate for the purpose of paying this enlisted man.

The Senate also recedes from its amendment to appropriate $3,000 for the purpose of providing additional bath-tubs; leaving the appropriation as it was in the original bill, of $2,000 for that purpose.

Unless some gentleman desires to be heard, I will ask for a vote on adopting the report of the committee of conference.

The report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. KEIFER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDEXING CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SCALES. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back with a favorable recommendation Senate bill No. 1692, to limit the cost of indexing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to ask for its present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Joint Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to make the necessary provisions and arrangements for issuing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly during the sessions of Congress; that the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to print and distribute the same number of copies of said semi-monthly index as he prints and distributes of the daily issue of the RECORD, and to the same persons and in the same manner; that the Public Printer shall employ such person to prepare said index as shall be designated by the Joint Committee on Printing, who shall also fix and regulate the compensation to be paid by the Public Printer for the said work, and direct the form and manner of its publication: Provided, however, That the rate of compensation allowed for preparing the said semi-monthly indexes, including their compilation into a complete session index, shall not exceed, for each page of the printed CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the average that it cost per page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for compiling the session index of the Forty-sixth Congress: And provided further, That there may be employed and paid on said work, at times not interfering with their ordinary employment, persons who are also employed and paid in any other office or employment under the Government.

SEC. 2. That the joint resolution approved February 8, 1881, entitled "Joint resolution to provide for printing and distributing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly," is hereby repealed.

Mr. SCALES. I ask that the report be read; it is very short.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1692) "to limit the cost of indexing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD," respectfully report:

That this bill was prepared by the Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses to amend the act of February 8, 1881, in some details which they regard as essential to the economy and proper conduct of the work under their charge.

Under that act a very radical change was made in the methods and form of indexing the RECORD. These changes have not only proved of very great value, but also, it is estimated, effected a net saving of $30,000 in the cost of the indexes of the RECORD for the last Congress.

The committee find by experience that the work is very unequal. At times it requires a large force, at other times a small force. The amendment that the committee desire is simply to provide for the necessary elasticity in the force employed, by substituting a rated compensation for a fixed sum.

The amendment expressly stipulates that the rate of compensation shall not exceed the rate heretofore paid, and that the total amount shall be measured solely by the amount of work done. This will enable labor to be employed when needed and dispensed with when not needed.

The amendment is important to the economy and success of the work, and we accordingly report the bill back and recommend its immediate passage.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (S. R. 75) making an appropriation to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease. I desire its reference to the Committee on Agriculture, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. MILLS. Let it take the regular course.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it go to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. MILLS. But not to be reported back at any time. I object to that privilege.

Mr. RYAN. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that this is a matter of immediate importance——

Mr. MILLS. To the State of Kansas.

Mr. RYAN. No, sir; more than that; a matter affecting several States of the Union in which this disease has broken out; and if this House wishes to avoid national calamity it ought to act promptly. There ought to be no objection to giving the Committee on Agriculture the right to report this resolution at any time.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the request to report at any time——

Mr. MILLS. It is a matter affecting Kansas only.

Mr. RYAN. No, sir; the disease has broken out also in Illinois, Missouri, and some other States.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I think there will be no objection to that. The measure which the gentleman from Kentucky wants to reach has the right of way, and the sooner we get a vote on it the better.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BLACKBURN, it was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

PAYMENT OF TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. DORSHEIMER in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, as I said yesterday evening, the people of Illinois, of Ohio, of Iowa, and of the whole West and Northwest, as well as the people of Kentucky, are vitally interested in the immediate passage of this bill. The failure of this bill means bankruptcy, immediate and overwhelming, and ruin to many of the oldest, most important, and reliable firms in the State of Kentucky and throughout the West. It means financial embarrassment and ruin not only to the manufacturers of distilled spirits, but to thousands of innocent purchasers and holders of whisky, and to tens of thousands more who are employed in cooperage and other allied industries. It means serious embarrassment to many of the leading banking institutions of the country. It means a monetary crisis in the West whose results no prudent business man would wish to precipitate or dare to predict. But while that is true, while I recognize the grave peril which confronts my constituents, I would be unworthy of this place, I would not correctly represent them if I were to attempt to extort from your sympathies a vote which was condemned either by your judgment or your consciences. I would not, and I can say this in the presence of many of my colleagues who have known me on this floor for seven years past, I would not use an argument here which I did not believe was founded in sound logic. I would not for my right hand knowingly make an incorrect statement of any point of fact or law involved in this bill. If I do I invite interruption and correction, only asking that the gentleman calling me to order shall do so briefly and pertinently.

We come to you therefore as jurors, jurors sworn to hear the law and the facts of this case. Our only appeal to you, when this great interest stands at the bar of Congress asking remedial legislation, is that without passion, without prejudice you shall give it a fair and an impartial hearing; a request which in any criminal court would be granted to the meanest and guiltiest felon in the land. If upon such hearing you are satisfied that the rights and property of those who own this great property can be secured without loss or detriment to the Government, we ask you to say so by the passage of this bill. If, on the other hand, you conclude that the Government needs the money which is shortly to become due, and needs it so much that even the ruin of thousands of its citizens should not prevent its collection, we will bow submissively to your judgment, and our people will prepare as best they can to meet the crisis before them.

COMMERCIAL IMPORTANCE OF THIS INDUSTRY.

Mr. Chairman, if no other reason existed, the magnitude and importance of the distilling interest would, it seems, command a hearing from this House.

As appears from the last report of Hon. Walter Evans, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, there has "been collected from that article alone, to support the Government and to aid in the payment of its war debt, the enormous sum of $1,017,233,042.45 since 1862." The magnitude of this sum can hardly be realized without comparison. The net ordinary expenditures of our Government, for the support of the Army, Navy, Indians, pensions, and all its civil service, did not reach $26,000,000 a year for more than three or four years from its organization till the beginning of the Mexican war, 1846. The average of expenditures during that period did not exceed $10,000,000. In other words, the amount paid by this interest into the Treasury would have paid the ordinary expenses of the Government, as above stated, from its organization up to the present time.

The single State of Kentucky, which I have the honor in part to represent, has paid since 1862 the sum of $152,208,266.29 (see last report Commissioner Internal Revenue, page 95). The district which I represent paid last year the sum of $7,550,781.73. The receipts from distilled spirits for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, were $74,368,775.20. In preceding years the amount was much greater. There are invested in the plants and business of this industry not less than $200,000,000.

These figures give us some idea of the pecuniary importance of this interest. When we come to consider its importance with reference to agriculture and other allied interests, we find it equally astonishing. Last year witnessed a large reduction in the amount of spirits produced, but even then we find from the Commissioner's report (LXIII) that the quantity of grain used was 18,644,787 bushels. In 1882 the amount was 27,459,095 bushels, and in 1881 it was 30,318,000. The average quantity of grain used in the production of spirits for the last four years was 25,350,354 bushels. During the past six years 67,188,600 gallons of alcohol were exported to foreign countries, thus largely bringing about the inflow of specie to our country. It must be borne in mind, too, that the grain used in the manufacture of alcohol is of inferior quality—refuse grain, which to a large extent is unfit for any other use.

But not only in the consumption of grain is this interest an important one to the farming class and to the whole country, but it feeds and fattens every year large numbers of hogs and cattle. The live-stock fed in the year 1881 were as follows:

|---|---|
| Cattle | 83,867 |
| Hogs | 95,598 |
| | 179,469 |
| Total increase in weight of cattle.....pounds... | 18,495,404 |
| Total increase in weight of hogs.....pounds... | 10,720,474 |
| Total increase in weight of cattle and hogs.....pounds... | 29,215,878 |

In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, was as follows:

|---|---|
| Number of cattle fed at registered grain distilleries in the United States | 63,272 |
| Total increase in weight of cattle.....pounds... | 13,779,266 |
| Number of hogs fed at registered grain distilleries in the United States | 53,396 |
| Total increase in weight of hogs.....pounds... | 5,818,759 |
| Total number of cattle and hogs fed | 116,668 |
| Total increase in weight of cattle and hogs.....pounds... | 19,598,025 |

The coal consumed amounts annually to over 200,000 tons, giving employment to many thousands of people. So, also, the cooperage is a valuable industry, which in the West largely depends upon the distilling interest. In the State of Kentucky alone there are over 10,000 cooper-shops which are thus dependent. I have just received a letter from one of my constituents, Mr. Hugh Stafford, in which he says: "I have now 5,000,000 staves for which I have no market short of Europe, and can ship only at a heavy loss. In 1881 and 1882 I used over 2,000,000 pounds of hoop-iron and employed three hundred men. Now I am almost idle and almost ruined by loss on material. Every day I turn off coopers who want work and are suffering for work." This letter is an index to thousands.

Whether, therefore, you look at this industry from a tax-paying, a commercial, or agricultural standpoint its great importance—and the importance of its associated industries—must be recognized, and when it asks for a hearing from the Government which has so long been its great beneficiary, its request, I submit, deserves consideration.

What, then, is the legislation asked at your hands, what is its origin, history, nature, and merits?

I respectfully invite your attention to these points.

CONGRESS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE ORIGIN OF THIS BILL.

What, then, in the first place, is the origin of this bill? Why was it introduced in the last Congress? What necessity demanded the legislation it contemplates? I will briefly state the facts which antedated and caused its introduction. Before the last Congress met, a distinguished leader on the other side of the House, the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], in a speech which I have before me, delivered before the New York tariff convention, in the city of New York, on November 29, 1881, used the following unequivocal language:

> The time has come when we must determine whether our system of internal taxes shall be abolished or perpetuated. I aver that the abolition of these taxes would do more to harmonize the country than any single act of legislation that statesmanship can suggest. I trust it may be done, and done quickly.

Leading gentlemen also on our side of the House took the same position. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania on the Democratic side [Mr. RANDALL], in the speech which he made to his constituents on the occasion of his renomination for member of Congress in the same year, declared that the whole internal-revenue taxation would be abolishsd and ought to be abolished immediately.

> The burden of internal taxation—
> Said he—
> will be first abated as our debt shall be reduced by the payments and expenses decreased by reduction in our rate of interest.

Mr. KELLEY. As the gentleman has used my name, I beg him to permit me to say that I am to-day very anxious to relieve the distillers of this country of the tax on spirits. I favor it because it would relieve them of the monopoly and large emoluments they derive from being farmers-general of this national tax. I am for the abolition of internal taxation.

Mr. WILLIS. I stated only what the gentleman will accept as true, that this declaration was made to the country that the whole tax on whisky would be taken off. When the Forty-seventh Congress convened in December, 1881, the agitation for the immediate repeal of the tax was promptly begun. What was the effect? The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was made chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and this enforced the idea among the trade that such a result would be promptly secured. It paralyzed the markets. Values were disturbed. Trade was restricted. Dealers bought sparingly, as their necessity demanded. Men would not buy then, they will not buy now, when the threat of immediate abolition of this tax is hanging over this interest, because it implies a disadvantage of 90 cents on the gallon on the part of the man who has taken whisky out of bond, as compared with the man who has not done so.

As a result of this agitation the whisky interests were compelled to come to the last Congress and ask for relief. There had been, as I shall state presently, overproduction, but this was aggravated by the additional burden which this threatened abolition of the whole tax imposed. The owners of distilled spirits felt that, as Congress had thus prevented all sales except for immediate consumption, they ought not to be compelled to advance the tax upon the unsold amount, but that an unlimited extension of the bonded period should be granted, or at least sufficient time should be given for the final settlement of the question of abolition and the readjustment of the market. They did, therefore, come to Congress. Through the present honorable Speaker of the House [Mr. CARLISLE] a bill was introduced asking for the unlimited, the indefinite extension of the bonded period.

HISTORY OF THE PENDING BILL.

That bill was introduced into the last House on February 13, 1882. It went to the Committee on Ways and Means, and on March 16 following, just thirty-one days, it was adopted unanimously by that committee and was ordered to be reported favorably to the House. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was chairman of that committee; the honorable gentleman on my left [Mr. RANDALL] was a member of that committee; Mr. KASSON of Iowa, Mr. Dunnell of Minnesota, Mr. RUSSELL of Massachusetts, and Mr. MCKINLEY of Ohio, as well as our lamented friend Mr. Haskell, were also members of that committeee.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Kentucky does not wish, I know, to misstate my position even by inference.

Mr. WILLIS. Not at all.

Mr. RANDALL. I have always held that every character of legislation, when once referred to a committee, should be permitted to come out before the House. My conduct and that of the committee in reference to the bill which the gentleman refers to was not one of investigation at all. During most of the time occupied in hearing the matter I was absent, engaged in the consideration of other important matters. Most of the hearings were in the presence of the old Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I confess I did have great respect for his judgment and for his opinions, but my feeling in that regard has since been somewhat lessened.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when that bill came before this House did the gentleman from Kentucky find me voting for it?

Mr. WILLIS. Did the gentleman vote against it?

Mr. RANDALL. I was not here, and therefore could not have voted on either side. But my opposition to it was as well known as any legislative fact which can be established. Of this the gentleman himself must be aware, and the allusion he has made is a most unfortunate one.

When the bill went to the Senate it there became a question of investigation. I have no intention now in this debate to allude to what there took place, but it came back to this House with an odium that condemned it.

If the gentleman from Kentucky wants to make a point against me because I permitted this subject to come out of the Committee on Ways and Means and to be presented to the consideration of the House, is he aware whether a majority of the present Committee on Ways and Means which reports this bill have agreed to sustain it on the floor of this House? There is no minority report here accompanying this bill, and yet on yesterday and all through these proceedings there have been many members of the Committee on Ways and Means who have been found resisting the passage of the pending proposition in every form and on every vote.

Mr. WILLIS. Now I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania if that is fair when I make a statement of a historic fact for him to consume the whole of the little time I have?

Mr. RANDALL. For all your time I have taken I will make it good out of my own time.

Mr. WILLIS. Very well, then, go on.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to kill this matter instantly. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. I say again in the presence of this House that the last Ways and Means Committee unanimously, and I hold in my hand their report, within less than thirty-one days reported a bill for the unlimited extension of the bonded period. I say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was a member of that committee, and there is no minority report accompanying that bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Just as there is none to-day.

Mr. WILLIS. I am merely giving the history of the bill.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken if he supposes I am making any personal attack on him.

Mr. RANDALL. I know that, and I am merely anxious the whole history should be stated.

Mr. WILLIS. I am only stating a fact for the benefit of the House. The Ways and Means Committee came into this House with this bill on the 3d of April, 1882. Mr. Dunnell, of Minnesota, made that report. I will print it in the RECORD. The rules were suspended, and there were only twenty-nine men on this floor who voted against the bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he was not present. There were twenty-nine men——

Mr. RANDALL. It is my recollection that I was not present.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it is so. I have no doubt the gentleman from Kentucky has examined the record.

Mr. WILLIS. There were twenty-nine men only. That bill was for unlimited extension without any interest.

Mr. RANDALL. It was better in having no interest.

Mr. WILLIS. Over two months afterwards there was a second and more elaborate report by the Ways and Means Committee on the same bill. This also was unanimous. It then went to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Ways and Means of this House report this bill without any recommendation, and it is a notorious fact that a majority of the members of that committee are in this House voting against it. It comes here without a majority report.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman will not dispute the historical fact that the unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means made by Mr. Dunnell, of Minnesota, brought that bill into the House, and by a two-third majority of the House, there being only twenty-nine votes against it, the bill was passed. He will not dispute the fact that on the 6th June, 1882, there was another unanimous and elaborate report of over twenty pages from the same committee, vindicating its previous action. The last report was made by the chairman, Hon. W. D. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I never read the report of the committee, but only consented that the report might be made.

Mr. WILLIS. I am not arraigning anybody for his vote, but am simply stating facts.

Mr. RANDALL. But the gentlemen should so state it as not to permit improper inferences to be drawn.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to blame any gentleman for his action in that case, as I have said. I merely state the fact. The record of the facts is open for the inspection of the House. Whether the vote was right or wrong I do not now propose to discuss. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania was right then but wrong now.

THIS BILL INDORSED BY THE SENATE AND SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

But sir, as I was about to say, that bill went to the Senate. Mr. Folger had just been appointed Secretary of the Treasury, and he objected to the unlimited-extension feature of the bill without interest. He presented a letter to the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, in which he stated clearly that objection to the unlimited extension without interest and in which he with equal clearness and emphasis indorsed the present bill. I have here his exact language, which was quoted yesterday, and I shall quote it now for the information of the House. He says:

> I am not in antagonism to legislation that shall give temporary aid to an important branch of business. I believe it to be needed and that it may be so accorded as to be healthful to all. This can be effected by a prolongation, but for a fixed period, of the time for which spirits may remain in store without payment of tax.

Now, that is the identical bill that is before this Congress. Upon that letter of the Secretary of the Treasury the Finance Committee of the Senate unanimously reported a bill for a two-year extension without interest. That bill was reported to the Senate, the interest clause was added, and it passed. It came back to the House as a substitute for the unlimited-extension bill, but we were never able to reach it upon the Speaker's table. It came back in the last session of the last Congress and during the closing hours of Congress, and there were a thousand matters pressing for attention, which prevented us from ever securing a vote upon the bill.

Now, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that this bill in the last Congress was indorsed, first, by two unanimous reports of the Committee of Ways and Means of this House It was indorsed, second, by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose letter I will print in connection with the second report of the Ways and Means Committee. It was indorsed, third, by the two-thirds vote of this House, being every man that was present except twenty-nine. It was indorsed, fourth, by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Folger, from whose letter I have just quoted. It was indorsed, fifth, by the Finance Committee of the Senate; and was indorsed, sixth, by the vote of the Senate.

Sir, what legislation ever came before Congress with a weightier and more unanimous indorsement? Nor was this indorsement given unadvisedly. Never was a public measure subjected to a more rigid and relentless criticism. Never were the sluiceways of falsehood, slander, bigotry, and fanaticism wider open. Never was there a better organized, a more persistent, and I may say a more reckless opposition both in and out of Congress—an opposition due largely to selfish and personal rather than to public and patriotic considerations. But notwithstanding all these adverse circumstances the Senate, after many months of consideration, after calling before a special committee every man who was presumed to know anything to the detriment of the bill, after long and repeated discussions—the Senate sent back to the House, as a substitute for the unlimited bonded bill, a bill for two years' extension and interest, the exact bill which we are now discussing except that the interest demanded was 5 instead of 4½ per cent.

TERMS OF THE PENDING BILL.

What is that bill? It is a simple relief measure. It does not give an unlimited extension; it does not exempt from interest, as the Ways and Means Committee of the last Congress recommended; neither does it apply to distilled spirits hereafter made. It merely gives distilled spirits now in bond two more years in which to pay the tax, and requires during that time interest at 4½ per cent., that being now the highest rate of interest now received by the Government. No additional outage or leakage is allowed. A plainer, juster, and more equitable request was never made of any government.

IS THE SECURITY GOOD?—OPINION OF THE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE OF THE LAST HOUSE, OF THE FORMER AND PRESENT COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

One of the first questions to be answered is whether the security offered in this case is good. I will print in full the report of the Ways and Means Committee of the last House on this point. Their conclusions I give now. Referring to the supposed danger of loss in a case like this, the committee, after quoting the sections of the Revised Statutes prescribing what liens and remedies the Government shall have in such cases, says:

> It thus appears that, whether there is a warehouse bond or not, the Government has the following security for the payment of the tax:
> First. The possession of and the right to sell the whole quantity of spirits upon which the tax is due.
> Second. The joint and several personal liability of every person interested in the production of the spirits.
> Third. The first lien from the time the spirits are in existence on the distillery used in distilling the spirits, together with its machinery and fixtures and the tract or lot of land on which it is situated, including all buildings thereon.
> Fourth. A lien from the time when the assessment list is received by the collector upon all the property and rights of property belonging to the person or persons liable for the payment of the tax, and this includes not only goods, chattels, and real estate, but also stocks, securities, and evidences of debt.

Here, then, is a quadruple security. Under the existing law distillers of high wines, rye, wheat, bourbon and other grain-flavored spirits, are required to convey the product of the still directly to the receiving-cistern, from which it is drawn off by the gauger, in the presence of the storekeeper, into casks or packages, and immediately marked, branded, and gauged for taxation. This entry into warehouse must be made within the first five days of the succeeding month after the manufacture. Such entry shall describe the spirits, and give the serial numbers of the stamps upon them, and the amount of spirits in each package. At the time he makes such entry the distiller is required to give his bond in duplicate, with sureties satisfactory to the collector, that the tax shall be paid as specified in the entry, and at all events within three years from the date of entry. It is to be observed, therefore, that the bond is to be executed monthly, between the 1st and 5th of the month, for all the spirits that are withdrawn from the receiving-cisterns of a distillery and placed in a bonded warehouse during the preceding month. This is the warehouse bond referred to in the report above cited, and if a distillery continued in operation during a whole year there would be twelve such bonds in the hands of the collector of the district and duplicates thereof in the hands of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

I quote now from a letter forwarded on the 12th of last month by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. Said letter was written by Hon. Walter Evans, Commissioner of Internal Revenue. He says:

> The proposed bills which you have requested me to examine have for their object the extension of the time within which the tax shall be paid, provided the owner of the spirits asks for this extension. This, of course, he will not do unless he can not sell his spirits. By the terms of the bill it is provided that no allowance shall be made for loss by leakage or evaporation except as the law now permits, and interest is to be paid on the sum due to the United States from the time when the extension begins until payment is made. The security for the payment of the tax consists, first, in the distiller's bond, with proper personal security; second, a lien upon the spirits themselves, and they will become more valuable by reason of the increased age they will acquire during the period of extension; and, third, by a lien upon the distillery and distillery premises. Thus it will be seen that the Government is perfectly secure and will get interest at a rate as high as it pays on the national obligations, and will suffer no loss by reason of leakage or evaporation.
> The question then is a plain business one, namely, whether the creditor shall, in the terms just mentioned, whereby he is perfectly secure, extend time to a debtor who is in distress. It seems to me that unless the creditor needs the money, it would be harsh not to do so, and especially if by refusing a good customer may be ruined and the Government may in the end lose money by the failure to produce the article which pays the tax.

If trade should become prosperous the extension will not be asked for, although permitted by the provisions of the bill; and if it shall not become prosperous the debtor will be in very great distress unless this measure or something like it be adopted.

If the subject were any other than whisky there would probably be but very little difficulty. Viewing it in the abstract, as I have conceived it my duty to do, it seems to me that the name or quality of the article should not make any difference in determining a plain business proposition such as I suppose this to be. It was long since made a business matter by the Government in its mode of dealing with it.

The question of security, therefore, I rest upon the judgment of the Ways and Means Committee of the last Congress, as above quoted, and the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, both of which are based upon sections 3186, 3187, 3188, 3189, 3251, 3259, and 3262 of the Revised Statutes. Such, then, is the bill now under consideration. A simple relief measure for two years upon the whisky now in bond, without further leakage, requiring 4½ per cent. interest upon the tax, and with a quadruple lien as security.

CONGRESSIONAL AGITATION AND OVERPRODUCTION NECESSITATE THIS LEGISLATION.

What are the facts out of which this bill arose? Why is it necessary? One reason has already been given. Over two years ago prominent members of this House began an agitation for the total abolition of this tax, which stopped all demand for distilled spirits except for immediate consumption. The second reason is equally well known. Prior to 1878 and 1879 there had been, as all will remember, a depression of business of every kind. The resumption of specie payments in 1879 caused a revival of business, and this industry revived with the others. Distilleries, like other establishments, resumed operations. Money became plentiful. The demand for distilled spirits, both for consumption and investment, increased to unusual proportions. Contracts were made for the future. Distillers, finding this demand, answered it just as any other business would have done. Was there any crime in that? Some gentlemen seem to think that it was, and would punish the guilty culprits. There was no purpose, no conspiracy among these men to overproduce. There was no knowledge on their part of the fact until after it was an accomplished fact. They presently discovered—the dealers and the whole market discovered—that there was enough spirits on hand for two years in advance of the demand.

The following tabular statement will show the years and the amount of this overproduction:

| Fiscal year. | Gallons produced. | Gallons withdrawn, tax paid. | Gallons exported. | Gallons remaining in distillery warehouse. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1878 | 56,108,063 | 49,571,128 | 5,499,252 | 14,088,773 |
| 1879 | 71,892,621 | 51,892,714 | 14,837,581 | 19,212,470 |
| 1880 | 90,355,270 | 61,116,523 | 16,765,666 | 31,363,369 |
| 1881 | 117,728,150 | 67,377,623 | 15,921,482 | 64,648,111 |
| 1883 | 74,037,135 | 76,762,063 | 5,326,427 | 80,000,000 |

It will thus be seen that the production in 1878 was under the usual amount; that in 1879 was about normal. The overproduction began in 1880, but the bulk of it occurred in 1881 and 1882, the tax for which will fall due in the years 1884 and 1885. In the year 1883 the normal amount was again produced, while in the first six months of the fiscal year 1884 only 32,820,280 gallons have been manufactured, which will be 10,000,000 gallons below the normal annual production. In this connection I read from the recent letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue heretofore referred to:

It is evident that the Government can gain nothing from a revenue standpoint by doing anything to further decrease the production of distilled spirits or by refusing to do that which may preserve the industry from disaster. The financial interests of the Government would seem to be rather in the giving of relief, and certainly, if it can do so, without the loss of any money.

Whether the proposed legislation is enacted into a law or not, there will always be a certain proportion of the quantity of spirits produced taken out of bond by the payment of the tax due, namely, such quantity as may be needed for consumption; but, as I understand the subject, it is the large surplus or actual overproduction of the years 1880, 1881, and 1882 which is giving all the trouble, by requiring the outlay of so much capital, which will have to be idle until the whisky can be disposed of, which, in the present condition of the trade, seems impossible.

All variety of spirits are, it is true, entered into bonded warehouses, but much the greater portion of them are taken out at once, because needed for use. There is a class of spirits, however, which, in order to become available for use at all, must remain in the warehouse for a period of at least three years. The annual consumption of this class of spirits is estimated to be now not over 18,000,000, but there were produced of this class in 1879, 12,588,129 gallons; in 1880, 21,756,139 gallons; in 1881, 43,564,224 gallons; in 1882, 38,800,444 gallons; and in 1883, 13,446,899 gallons, making a surplus in the product in 1880 of about 3,500,000 gallons; in 1881, about 25,500,000 gallons; in 1882, about 20,800,000 gallons, making at this date a surplus of about 45,000,000 gallons altogether. This is the incubus upon the whole industry. "The tax upon it has to be paid to the Government, and the distillers and those behind them can not get relief except at the hands of the Government."

The exact month when the distilled spirits now in bond were produced and the time when the tax fell due will be seen from the following table, which was presented to the Senate Finance Committee of the last Congress, and which is taken from the books of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue:

Statement, by months, of spirits in bond, as shown by the records at the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Of the above, the following spirits are required to be tax-paid, as follows:

|---|---|---|
| From May 1, 1882, to December 31, 1882 | 1,761,647 gallons, | $1,585,482 30 |

| | 77,087,831 | 69,379,047 90 |

NOTE.—Over four-fifths of the above are held in bond by dealers residents of the States of Illinois, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, and Ohio. (The statistics show that less than one-seventh of the above is held by residents of Kentucky.)

The Secretary of the Treasury in his last report, page XLIV, says:

"There were remaining in distillery warehouses on the 30th of June, 1883, and the 30th of June, 1882, respectively, distilled spirits as follows:

| | Gallons. |
|---|---|
| June 30, 1883 | 80,499,993 |
| June 30, 1882 | 89,962,645 |

"There should, under the present law, come out of the bonded warehouses and pay tax distilled spirits as follows:

| | Gallons. |
|---|---|
| By June 6, 1884 | 26,104,531 |
| By July 6, 1884 | 3,495,512 |
| | 29,600,043 |

"On which the tax would be $26,640,038.70; the whole quantity in bonded warehouses to come out and pay tax by July 6, 1886, is 80,499,993 gallons, at a tax of 90 cents a gallon."

Commenting upon the above instructive and startling statistics, well has a distinguished Senator from my own State [Mr. BECK] declared:

These figures tell the whole story. I can add nothing to their force. The men who are required to pay these vast sums before they are able to sell the taxed goods confess their inability to do so; you are their representatives; no public necessity requires you to drive them into bankruptcy; all other interests will suffer by their ruin. We have become so accustomed to speak of millions that we hardly realize the magnitude of the sum they must pay within six months. The net ordinary expenditures of this Government for the support of the Army, Navy, Indians, pensions, and all its civil service did not reach $26,000,000 a year for more than three or four years from its organization till the Mexican war broke out in 1846-'47, and did not average half that sum, as the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, table 2, page 10, shows. It is folly to attempt to coerce it from a comparatively small number of citizens, when we do not need it and hardly know what to do with it, when by giving them time we will save them from ruin, and secure, as fast as we can use it, every dollar they owe.

WHY NOT RELIEVE ALL INDUSTRIES SUFFERING FROM OVERPRODUCTION.

I have thus, Mr. Chairman, referred briefly to the overproduction in this industry and alluded to some of the embarrassments resulting therefrom.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Was there not overproduction in all other commodities?

Mr. WILLIS. There was.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then why not relieve them also?

Mr. WILLIS. I will answer the gentleman. He is not the only one who has put this question. We have heard it in every direction and in every form since this bill was introduced. "Why does this interest ask more favor than any other?" "Why is it so constantly appealing to Congress for legislation?" "Why should not the iron industry, why should not silk, glass, cotton, or the farming industry be relieved in the same manner?" The answer to all of these questions is that none of these industries occupy the same relation to Congress and to the Government as this does.

Tobacco and distilled spirits are the only articles of domestic production in this country which are now taxed. They are, therefore, exceptional. We have reduced the tax on tobacco to 8 cents per pound. The tax on distilled spirits is even more marked, for upon them we impose the enormous tax of from 400 to 600 per cent. The cost of manufacturing distilled spirits ranges from 15 to 30 cents per gallon. Every gallon must pay a tax of 90 cents. Under existing law, upon the expiration of three years from the day of manufacture every owner of whisky must pay to the Government five times the cost of its production. And this he must do whether he can sell it, whether he can find a consumer, or not. There is no other industry in the world that is taxed so high. There is no other industry in the United States except tobacco that is taxed even 1 mill. Your iron industry, your glass, and all other industries are hedged in and protected by a high tariff. They are taking their millions out of the pockets of the people. Why should they come to Congress? To them Congress has extended the hand of friendship and protection; this interest you would have it crush beneath its feet as unworthy of even a moment's consideration. You would "kill it instantly."

When other industries are embarrassed by overproduction they do not, it is true, come to Congress, nor on the other hand does Congress—does the Government—go to them. They are left to right themselves, which in due time they do. Overproduction in any industry soon corrects itself.

Suppose when your iron industry was embarrassed, as it now is, we should pass a law imposing a tax upon every ton which you manufactured, a tax five times greater than the cost of the article. Suppose, further, that Congress should say to your iron manufacturer as it does to the whisky manufacturer, at a fixed time, three or four or five years from the time you manufacture your iron, "My tax-gatherer will call on you for this enormous tax, and you must pay it whether there is any market for your iron, whether you have found a consumer, or not." Let the law be so changed and your constituents and mine will stand upon an equal plane, and you will be able to see clearer than you do now the harsh injustice of refusing the paltry boon which we are here asking for.

It is because the heavy hand of the Government rests upon us that we come asking that hand to be temporarily removed. It is not the burden of the dead capital which is the only burden which other industries during a period of overproduction are called upon to bear. That burden we, too, can carry, but when the Government insists at this time in imposing the additional burden, five times greater, we find ourselves unable to bear it, and we cry out for relief. Take, if you will, your pound of flesh, claim the forfeit of your bond, but do not hope that the calm and unprejudiced judgment of the commercial world will recognize your act as either just, prudent, or defensible.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman another question, whether the friends of this very measure are not opposed to the repeal of the tax upon whisky?

Mr. WILLIS. The friends of this measure are as divided upon this question as they are upon any other. For myself, I answer the gentleman with great frankness that, as at present informed, I will not vote for the removal of the tax on whisky, thus making it cheap and free to all.

I give him my individual answer, and in giving that I do not propose to say that all the friends of this bill agree with me. This is not a political question. It is not a temperance question. It is simply an economic business question, and the men who manufacture are divided in their opinions upon it.

The majority of the manufacturers as far as I know are Republicans. The strongest supporters of this bill; the largest interests in this business with which I have been brought in contact are members of your party

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I am not raising this question in any party sense; but the question I asked the gentleman was this, whether the beneficiaries of this bill are not opposed to the repeal of the whisky tax?

I say again that the beneficiaries of this bill have never taken a position on this question, and as far as I know the majority of them are in favor of your proposition. I am not. But I do not claim to represent or to know what their sentiment is.

INCONSISTENCY OF SOME OF THE OPPONENTS OF THIS BILL.

I will say further to the gentleman that I do not see the significance of his question. What does he mean? Does he hope to coerce the representatives of the districts largely interested in this direction into a support of this free-whisky measure? Does he want to hold over me and my people the threat of bankruptcy if we dare to refuse our support to that theory of reform? I hope not; and yet I can see no other meaning to his question. We are to be punished for daring to be independent in our legislative duty.

Mr. Chairman, the inconsistency of some gentlemen who oppose this bill is remarkable. There are twenty or thirty gentlemen before me who voted in the last Congress for an unlimited, indefinite extension of the bonded period without interest who now refuse a short respite of two years with full interest. They were willing then to make a permanent change in the revenue law for all time; they are unwilling now to give a temporary relief for a brief period. Why this inconsistency? What change has come over these spirits?

There are other gentlemen, like the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania on our side [Mr. RANDALL], and the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania on the other side [Mr. KELLEY], who say, "We are ready to relieve your people by taking all the tax off of whisky at once." They are thus willing to make a gracious gift to the owners of distilled spirits of $50,000,000. What munificent generosity! And yet in the next breath they declare that these whisky people have had enough favorable legislation. They are asking too much of Congress. Other interests are not clamoring for relief. And yet they are willing today to give us fifty millions of the people's money. Why? Can any one give an answer consistent with the line of argument that has been followed by the opponents of this bill? If the distilling interests have had enough favors, why burden them with this? The only favor we ask we are ready to pay for. That they refuse to grant, but offer us a fifty-fold greater one. What would be thought of the consistency of a tavern-keeper who would refuse to let a traveler have his breakfast though ready and willing to pay for it, but who offered him breakfast, dinner, and supper all free if taken together?

IS THIS A TEMPERANCE QUESTION?

Another class of honorable gentlemen oppose this bill because of the idea that it involves in some way the temperance question, and throughout the country a number of good people have given themselves trouble for the same reason. I presume every gentleman here has received resolutions and newspapers to this effect.

I have, Mr. Chairman, the greatest respect as an individual and as a legislator for these good people and for their representatives upon this floor. Thousands of my consituents are advocates of this cause, and I presume every man of heart would be glad to find some remedy for the terrible evils of intemperance.

But will the defeat of this bill be a step in that direction? If you fail to pass this bill you throw upon a bankrupt market 50,000,000 gallons of whisky at such cheap prices that it will be within reach of the scantiest purse. You inaugurate for the next two years a saturnalia of drunkenness and crime. You enable new men to buy these distilleries at marshals' and sheriffs' sale at half their value. They will thus be enabled to continue the era of cheap whisky.

I am opposed to such results. I want the man who uses whisky to pay the highest price for it. I would put it beyond his reach. I would not for the purpose of wreaking a temporary vengeance upon those engaged in this business ruin them in order to enable a new and more powerful class of men to build upon that ruin a greater and more lucrative business of the same character. I see no temperance in that. I see only a headlong folly, that like a blind adder would strike regardless of results.

IS THIS CLASS LEGISLATION?

Other gentlemen have said they would vote for this bill if it did not look like special or class legislation. In answer I desire to say that distilled spirits is the only victim of special legislation now in this land. It is the only taxable article, whether internal or external, that under the law is compelled to pay a tax before it reaches the consumer. But as the Ways and Means Committee of the last Congress have presented an unanswerable argument upon that point, and as it is the unanimous report of that committee, I will ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

I ask gentlemen, as they are to sit in judgment upon this question, to give their attention to the result of the examination of the subject by the Ways and Means Committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. An indefinite extension of the time during which distilled spirits may remain in bond.—Under the existing internal-revenue laws distilled spirits is the only article upon which the Government requires the tax to be paid before it is actually sold or removed for sale or consumption. In every other case the manufacturer keeps the article in his own possession and under his own exclusive control, without the payment of any tax until he chooses to sell it or remove it for consumption or sale.

The manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, cigars, beer, matches, perfumery, cosmetics, &c., are permitted to hold their goods until there is a consumptive demand for them, and pay the tax only when they sell. As we shall see hereafter, none of them are required to execute any bonds except as manufacturers, and the Government does not have the custody or control of their products, as it does in the case of distilled spirits. In all these cases the tax is strictly upon consumption, and the manufacturer or owner is permitted to take advantage of favorable markets and avoid unfavorable ones to the same extent precisely as if there were no tax upon his goods. This is undoubtedly the true principle of excise taxation. While the Government is justifiable in exacting its revenue, it is not justifiable in attempting to control the trade in a legitimate article of commerce by forcing the owner either to sell at a loss on the original cost of production or to permanently invest the amount of the tax in addition to that cost.

In his annual report for the year 1879 the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, speaking of deficiency taxes upon spirits withdrawn for exportation, used the following language:

"The intention of the internal-revenue laws is to levy a tax of 90 cents a g.

lon upon spirits which are manufactured for and actually go into consumption in this country, and the tax in question is evidently not intended for revenue, but as a restrictive measure to prevent fraud.

"There appears to be no sufficient reason why the single article of distilled spirits should be excepted from the general rule applied to all other taxable products. It can not be for the mere purpose of preventing fraud on the revenue, for certainly there is not as much danger of a fraudulent removal of the property without the payment of the tax in a case where the Government itself has actual possession and control of it as in the cases where it is left in the custody of the manufacturer or owner under a bond that he will pay the tax when he sells or removes it. And so far as the cost of governmental supervision is involved, it is exactly the same whether the spirits remain in the warehouse for one year or for an indefinite time. The compensation of the storekeeper is the same in amount in each case, and his constant attendance at the warehouse is required in both.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Kentucky was interrupted and I heard intimations that his time would be extended. I ask that it be extended for a few minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask that half an hour be yielded to my colleague, because he represents a district having the largest quantity of spirits in bond of any district in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended half an hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I object. I will give the gentleman, however, fifteen minutes out of my own time.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope we will have an extension of time for discussion on this bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I invite the attention of the House to that report. It declares the principle and true rule of excise to be that the article shall not pay the tax till it reaches the consumer. Why should you want to discriminate against distilled spirits? If I overproduce a million kegs of beer the Government does not require the payment of the tax on the beer at once, but lets it remain until I find a consumer. If I overproduce snuff, tobacco, and cigars, I can keep them forever in my warehouse. And the same rule applies to external commerce. If I import whisky, it can lie three years in bond and then be exported and brought back without any injury, and thus practically an indefinite extension is granted in the case of external commerce.

Why should our home manufacturers, upon whom we have placed this onerous burden of 500 per cent. tax—why should they be compelled to compete at such great disadvantage with the foreign manufacturer of whisky? Why should we want to punish our own citizens, who hire their labor here, who buy the corn and rye and coal and barrels for their industry from our own people, who employ our home labor? Why should we want to refuse to him the same privilege we now under existing law grant to the foreigner? Why should we let sherry and madeira wines come in, which are worth $5 a gallon and pay only a tax of 40 cents a gallon? Here we impose a tax of 10 per cent., while upon whisky we impose 500 per cent. The rich man who uses his fine imported wines pays a 10 per cent. duty; the poor man who drinks his glass of whisky must pay 20 cents, taxed 400 per cent. Is this a fair, equitable, and American system? Away with such discrimination.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. My colleague has made a comparison between whisky and tobacco in bond. I wish to ask him whether he considers that a fair comparison? Is not tobacco in warehouses constantly deteriorating in value? And is not whisky growing continually better?

Mr. WILLIS. The answer to that is that the rule is not as to tobacco only, but as to beer, cigars, snuff, and everything that is taxable in this country except distilled spirits. As a matter of fact, snuff and tobacco grow better as they are kept in the warehouse; but let that go. Every article in this country except distilled spirits pays the tax only when it reaches the consumer.

But, further, what an absurdity to assume that the manufacturer of whisky is not as much interested in getting rid of his goods at the earliest moment as the manufacturer of beer or tobacco. Is a positive statute necessary to inform the distiller when the loss on his goods begins? Must he be coerced into letting go his goods? If any gentleman here indulges such a belief let him offer to buy a million gallons even at the present bankrupt prices, and he will see how quick he will become one of this unfortunate class.

Moreover, my colleague well understands that when tobacco, snuff, beer, and cigars are taken from the warehouse for consumption they are in a completed condition of manufacture; they are ready for sale and use. Indeed the most of these articles are ready as soon as made, and yet they pay tax only when withdrawn for consumption, whether that be one or ten years.

Now, fine table whiskies, unlike high wines, require age before they are ready for use. The fusil oil and other poisonous substances are eliminated by atmospheric action; a process which requires three, four, and five years or more, according to the taste of the purchaser. When first made they are absolutely unfit for drinking. Age is a necessary element in their completed manufacture. Time ripens them as it ripens the fruit upon the tree. Until that time is elapsed whisky is not on an equality with any one of the articles of internal taxation.

EFFORTS TO CORRECT THE OVERPRODUCTION.

Again it is said, why have not these men themselves corrected this evil? In answer to that I say that they have done so. In the first place the number of distilleries has been largely reduced. This is true both of the high-wine and fine-whisky distilleries.

In the States of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, and Wisconsin, where high wines are chiefly produced, there were in operation in October, 1881, 82 distilleries, with a daily producing capacity of 261,200 gallons, while on the 1st of September, 1883, there were in these same States 40 distilleries in operation, with a daily producing capacity of 197,331 gallons.

In the States of Kentucky, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, in which fine whiskies which require aging are chiefly manufactured, the decrease has been still more marked, as the following statement will show:

| States. | October 1, 1881. | | September 1, 1883. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Distilleries. | Daily capacity. | Distilleries. | Daily capacity. |
| | | Gallons. | | Gallons. |
| Maryland | 8 | 9,844 | 3 | 2,139 |
| Pennsylvania | 50 | 21,665 | 15 | 2,063 |
| Kentucky | 91 | 103,082 | 33 | 10,127 |
| Total | 149 | 234,541 | 51 | 14,329 |

It will thus be seen that in two years there has been a reduction in the distilleries in operation of 98 and of 220,212 gallons in the daily producing capacity.

They have not only reduced the production, but they have canceled large outstanding contracts. Many men have paid from ten to twenty thousand dollars each to cancel contracts under which these distillers were authorized to go ahead and manufacture additional thousands of barrels. Besides that, they have been compelled to export this whisky, which, under existing law, can be done. To-day Congress is doing the unbusiness thing of compelling these men, those who are able to do it, to export this whisky to a foreign market, where they can leave it as long as they please and then bring it back without paying interest on the tax and with a reduction for leakage. They will pay duty only upon what comes back. If a man exports a million gallons and half a million disappear by leakage, when it comes back to this country he will pay tax only on what is left, and he will pay no interest. Already during the past fiscal year 988,842 gallons of these fine whiskies have been thus forced to seek a refuge in a foreign land. Thus may we deprive our own Government of large revenues and our own people of the money which must be paid for insurance, transportation, and warehousing.

Another important step which the distillers have taken to correct overproduction, especially in my own State, has been the establishment of a Kentucky pool association, with authority to regulate the amount of production. Exercising this authority, they ordered for the year 1883 that the capacity of production should be reduced 66⅔ per cent. of the average production for the years 1881 and 1882. It is because of this action that the last report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows such remarkable decrease of bourbon or old whiskies.

They have been compelled most unwillingly to resort to these means of averting this danger. But there are thousands of men who are not capitalists, who have invested in ten and twenty and fifty barrels of whisky, and have borrowed money from the banks for the purpose. Those banks hold the warehouse receipts as collateral and will not allow this whisky to be exported for fear of invalidating their loans, so that the burdens fall on the poor, and not upon the rich.

WHO OWN THE SPIRITS NOW IN BOND?

Mr. DUNHAM. Who hold the warehouse certificates, the distillers or the banks?

Mr. WILLIS. The distillers hold comparatively little of it. If this bill passes it will benefit the distillers only indirectly. The whisky has been bought by men as an investment, just as they would buy iron or cotton or any other article of merchandise. It is owned to-day by men, by women, by orphans in my district, whose money has been invested in it in the hope that it would increase in value.

But I can probably better answer the gentleman's question by quoting again from the report of the Committee on Ways and Means:

A very small proportion of the spirits in bond is actually owned by the distillers who own and keep the warehouses. Returns from the bonded warehouses of forty-three distillers in the State of Kentucky show that they now contain 34,421,574 gallons of spirits, of which only 5,684,133 gallons, or about 16 per cent., belong to citizens of that State. How much of these 5,684,133 gallons belongs to the distillers and the warehousemen themselves, and how much to other citizens of the State, who are mere dealers, the committee has no certain means of ascertaining; but reasoning from the well-known course of the trade, it may be safely concluded that the parties who manufacture the spirits actually own but a small part of them. As a general rule they sell the article about as rapidly as it is produced, and the dealers leave it on storage in the warehouses until there is a demand for it in the market. The remaining 28,737,441 gallons now held in the forty-three warehouses alluded to are owned by citizens of almost every other State and Territory in the Union, as is shown by the following statement:

Table showing residence of the owners of whiskies now in the distillery bonded warehouses of forty-three distilleries in Kentucky, embracing the second, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth collection districts.

| Canada | 50 | 2,350 |
| Scattered | 5,100 | 239,700 |
| Total | 732,372 | 34,421,574 |

It will thus be seen that the statements made in the newspapers and elsewhere as to the amount of whisky owned by people of Kentucky is ludicrously wide of the mark. Kentucky owns only about one-tenth of the whisky now in bond, but that, in view of her limited capital, will be enough, if this bill fails and no other relief is found, to create the most serious disturbance in her financial condition. It must be borne in mind that in addition to the whisky carried in bond Kentucky has invested many millions of dollars in distillery plant. When it is understood that the whole capital of Kentucky, as given in the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, was only $12,567,900, the necessity for relief to her people, as well as the utter absurdity of the statement that over 50,000,000 gallons of this whisky was owned in her borders, are simultaneously demonstrated.

WHY BANKRUPTCY HAS NOT ALREADY BEEN THE RESULT.

It has been said again you predicted financial embarrassment two years ago when the first effort at relief was made. Why has it not come? A twofold answer might be made to this query. First, we might say with truth such has been the case. In Saint Louis, in Cincinnati, in Louisville, and all other places in this land, old and reliable houses, whose commercial standing was first-class, have been unable to meet this heavy tax and have gone to the wall. In my own city I recall at this moment one firm which because of non-action by the last Congress—the bill having been clogged up on the Calendar—was compelled to suspend, though doing a business of several millions of dollars a year. I recall another bankrupted for the same reason, which was one of the oldest and best-known establishments in the West. And what is true of Louisville is equally if not more the truth in New York, Saint Louis, in Cincinnati, and in all the leading commercial centers of the country. My first response, therefore, to the question as to our previous prophecies is that they have been fully verified. It may be that enough of our merchants have not yet been bankrupted to answer the reasonable and merciful wishes and expectations of some who voted then and will vote to-day against any measure of relief to this interest, however just and proper; but I can say to these gentlemen, if such there be, that however much they may have been disappointed in the number and character of the predicted failures, there have been enough, full enough for our people. The failures which have already occurred will amount to more than the whole banking capital of two-thirds of the States of the Union. And this they could more fully realize if they could look abroad in the country and see the thousands of workingmen who have been thrown out of employment, &c.

I might call attention by name to these houses, but I will not parade their misfortunes before the country. They were honorable men, who made an honest mistake in their business calculations; and the last Congress failing, not refusing, to give relief, they went into bankruptcy. But while the past has been bad enough, but not worse than we anticipated, the present is still more gloomy and threatening. The reason for this is apparent to every man well informed upon our revenue system. It was the present trouble that we foresaw and sought in time to prevent.

Two years ago the people of the West knew that two years' overproduction had recurred. They knew to the day when the 90-cent tax would fall due. They knew the number of gallons in warehouse, and that after three years, whether a consumer could be found or not, the whisky must come out and the Government tax must then be paid.

The table which I have already referred to, which was before the Senate Finance Committee, gives the exact amount as shown upon the books of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that would fall due on the 6th of each month, and at the foot of the table is the total number of gallons coming out each fiscal year.

It will be seen that for the year 1882 there were only one and a half millions of gallons, but for the following year, 1883, there were fifteen millions, and for 1884 over 38,000,000 gallons. These facts and figures were as well known then as now. We knew that except by legislation or exportation there was no escape from them. Like the man confined in a room whose adjustable walls he saw daily closing in upon him we sought to escape. We knew we were in a stream which led to ruin. We knew that just ahead was the cataract, and with its roar in our ears was it to be expected that we would wait until we were directly on the edge? Would that have been the course of prudent men? Many of our best firms having already gone over the edge, shall we wait until they all are dashed to destruction before we cry out for rescue?

PRECEDENTS IN FAVOR OF THE BILL.

Will it be said that this legislation is new and unusual in Congress? If necessary I could cite fifty different acts of a character similar to this. Your statute-books are loaded down with acts granting indulgence to the debtors for public lands. This as far back as 1809. When in 1835 the merchants of New York came to Congress asking an extension of their bonds for five years—the bonds due for imported goods—it was the great Henry Clay of my native State who championed their cause and secured the passage of the act which gave them the relief asked for, and that too without interest. When Chicago came here under similar circumstances you promptly and properly extended her bonds. Will you say that this relief was based upon great calamities which had befallen their people? I accept the statement, and I point you to a flood which has just inflicted upon the people of the Ohio Valley losses five times greater than the fire of New York. And mark you, gentlemen, the goods for which these bonds were extended were not taxed one-tenth the amount imposed upon distilled spirits, while the land paid no Federal tax.

SHRINKAGE OF VALUES.

If, then, these precedents are all in favor of this legislation; if the last Congress, both in the House and Senate, indorsed it; if the facts fully justify it; if the last Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the present one and the Secretary of the Treasury approve it; if justice demands it, why should it not be given?

Is this a time to experiment with the commercial interests of the country? Look at the shrinkage in this species of property: The product of Kentucky, Pennsylvania, and Maryland whisky for the year 1881 was worth when produced from 55 to 65 cents per gallon, according to brand. The best brands of these whiskies can be bought to-day at from 36 to 45 cents per gallon after being warehoused three years at a cost of about 20 cents per gallon, not including shrinkage.

What do these figures mean? They mean a loss of from thirty to forty millions of dollars. But what further? There has been a shrinkage of at least 50 per cent. in distillery plant, which would make another $60,000,000. Within the last forty days there has been a shrinkage in the price of whisky in bond of 5 cents a gallon, a loss of $4,000,000 to those holding it. Is this the condition of safety, even if this were the only interest that has suffered? But do we not know that there has been a shrinkage in stocks and bonds running up to hundreds of millions of dollars; an enormous shrinkage in pork, corn, and all the great staples of the country? Do we not remember that the great panic of 1857 began with the failure of a single firm in the city of Cincinnati, the Union Trust Company? Do we not know that our last panic of 1873 was caused by the failure of a single firm in this city, Jay Cooke & Co.? Do we want these episodes repeated? Confidence is the keystone of the commercial arch. Let us not strike it from its place. Let us be conservative toward all the great interests intrusted to our care.

One fact more. In England, where you found a market for your corn, during the last year they have supplied themselves from India, as the London Economist lately shows, with one-third of all the grain they need, and it is predicted that in less than three years they will be independent of the United States. What then will become of the hundreds of millions of bushels of grain now used in this great industry? If this bill fails and these distilleries should be closed and the demand from abroad shall cease, you will again see the time when corn will be burned for fuel in your great Western corn-producing States.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman state what proportion of the grain raised last year was used for the manufacture of alcohol? Or will he allow me to state that it was about 1½ per cent.?

Mr. WILLIS. Last year, as I have heretofore shown, there were consumed in this business in round numbers 18,000,000 of bushels of grain, while the year before there was used for the same purpose over 25,000,000 of bushels, showing a reduction of nearly 8,000,000 of bushels. What has been the result? The price of corn has gone down. And I will show to this House, upon tables which I will produce here, that the price of corn for the past ten years has been regulated largely by the demand of these distilleries.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman will permit me to say that as large a percentage of our corn crop goes into glucose as into alcohol; and it is stated that it would not hurt the corn crop to shut up the distilleries.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Kentucky has a tabulated statement of the amount of money produced from the tax on liquor and used by the Government during the war to secure its salvation?

Mr. WILLIS. I would say to the gentleman that since 1862 over one thousand millions of dollars have been paid into the Federal Treasury by this single interest. It has fed and clothed your Army; it has supported the public credit; it has saved you from bankruptcy; it has enabled you to pay your hundreds of thousands of pensioners. And now upon this plain, just, economic proposition, recommended, I repeat, by the Secretary of the Treasury, recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, recommended by the leading committee of this House, I ask your prompt and favorable action.

Mr. MILLIKEN. As the gentleman has stated how many taxes whisky has paid, will he be kind enough to inform this House how many taxes whisky has made in the same time?

Mr. WILLIS. Now, the gentleman from Maine knows that that question has no pertinency to this bill. He knows that to-day the main opposition to this bill comes from men who want to make whisky free; and if we would yield to their demand to-day we could have this bill passed through with railroad speed. I stand here for dear whisky. I stand here insisting that it is an article which ought to be taxed. But those who oppose us, at least many of them, are in favor of cheap whisky. I do not know whether the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] unites with them or not.

Mr. MILLIKEN. No, sir, I do not; and when we come to a vote the gentleman will find that I do not.

Mr. WILLIS. Then let the gentleman join us to prevent the accomplishment of that result.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the numerous petitions from leading banking and business firms which are here urging this legislation. I have just this moment received this dispatch. It is one of thousands which have been voluntarily sent:

NEW YORK, March 20, 1884.

Hon. ALBERT S. WILLIS, Washington, D. C.:

We believe the mercantile interests of this country demand the extension of the bonded bill and trust you may be successful in your efforts.

H. B. CLAFLIN & CO.

I need not remind this House that the firm signing this dispatch is the largest in the great metropolis of New York. That message is an index to the sentiments of thousands of firms in the United States. These petitions are from all the leading commercial centers—from New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Saint Louis, Baltimore, San Francisco, Denver, Detroit, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Louisville, Omaha, &c. They declare that if these spirits are forced out upon a falling market "serious financial embarrassment" will ensue. We know that bankers do not sound an unnecessary note of alarm. When many thousand bankers send this word to us we know it has the greatest significance and should command our immediate attention. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue tells us that there are already 5,000,000 gallons on the market without a purchaser. We propose to add fifty more millions. We can do it. We have the power; but let us see to it that in our attempt to pull down this industry we do not, Samson-like, destroy the whole temple of commercial prosperity.

[Here the hammer fell.]

APPENDIX.

No. 1.

[House Report No. 1277, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

EXTENSION OF BONDED PERIOD FOR DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. KELLEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the preamble and resolution relative to the passage by the House of a bill "to amend the laws relating to the entry of distilled spirits in distillery and special bonded warehouse, and the withdrawal of the same therefrom," respectfully report:

On the 10th day of April last the following preamble and resolution were introduced into the House, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, to wit:

"Whereas on Monday, April 3, the rules were suspended and the bill (H. R. 5237) to amend the laws relative to the entry of distilled spirits in distillery and special bonded warehouse, and the withdrawal of the same therefrom, was passed; and

"Whereas the following letter was subsequently printed, at the request of a member, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to wit:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 3, 1882.

SIR: I acknowledge receipt of your valued favor of this instant in regard to House bill 5237, which provides for an extension of the bonded period upon distilled spirits.

The bill was prepared with great care, and in respect to its machinery I am satisfied it will work admirably. The principle of the bill, I think, is correct. Upon all manufactured articles upon which the internal-revenue tax is levied, except in the case of distilled spirits, the manufacturer or owner is not compelled to remove the same from the place of manufacture until he can find a sale for the product. This is so in respect to beer, tobacco, cigars, matches, &c. The extension of the bonded period to three years gave quite a stimulus to the manufacture of fine whiskies. On the 1st of March last there were 69,243,835 gallons in distillery warehouses in Kentucky, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. It seems to me unreasonable to suppose that these spirits can all be removed for consumption within the time now required by law. If the manufacturers and owners are required to pay the taxes within three years, I would expect to see such a decline in prices as would seriously embarrass many strong firms, probably cause many failures, and unfavorably affect other branches of business without any beneficial results to the Government. I think upon this ground alone the extension of the bonded period is entirely justifiable.

Very respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Hon. BEN BUTTERWORTH,
House of Representatives.

"And whereas it appears that the proposed law will divert millions of public money from its way into the United States Treasury and donate the same to the large manufacturers and owners of distilled spirits in violation of the agreement of the Republicans of the House: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to report to this House his views on the subject-matter of the letter and the conduct of the head of the Internal Revenue Bureau as to what improper influences, 'if any,' were brought to bias his judgment in writing the same."

Although the resolution designates bill No. 5237, the committee supposes that bill No. 5656 is the measure really intended, as the latter is the only one relating to distilled spirits passed by the House during the present session of Congress. The measure referred to was, in various forms, pending before the committee from the 13th day of February until the 3d day of April, and was subjected to a very careful examination, not only in the committee itself but by the officers in charge of the Internal Revenue Bureau. It was once reported to the House and recommitted, in order that the proposed changes in its provisions might be thoroughly examined and understood; and finally it was reported a second time and passed, almost unanimously, under a suspension of the rules. Not only was the bill placed in the hands of the internal-revenue authorities for investigation, but the head of that branch of the public service, in obedience to the request of the committee, came before it in person, and suggested various changes and modifications of its provisions, every one of which was adopted by the committee and incorporated into the measure before it was finally reported to the House.

The history of the bill, as shown by the records of the committee and the House, is as follows:

"February 2. A delegation representing distillers and dealers appeared before the committee. G. C. Wharton, as attorney, addressed committee and presented draught of bill to amend the laws in relation to internal revenue, and for other purposes. C. S. Clarke, representing Western Distillers' Export Association; W. S. Shufeldt, president, and D. G. Rush, secretary, National Spirit Dealers' Association, also addressed committee in favor of bill.

"February 13. Mr. Carlisle introduced bill to amend the internal-revenue laws (4281).

"February 23. H. R. 4281 was referred to subcommittee on changes in internal-revenue laws.

"March 16. At morning session of committee a delegation representing Western distillers was heard. Addresses were made by C. W. Moulton, of Cincinnati; T. H. Sherley, of Louisville; E. G. Curley, of Lexington; and G. T. Stagg, of Saint Louis.

"Committee reassembled in the afternoon, when Mr. Dunnell, from the Committee on Changes in Internal Revenue Laws, reported a substitute for H. R. 4281. The substitute was read and considered by sections, and after being amended was adopted unanimously by the committee, and was ordered to be reported favorably to House. (See H. R. 5237.)

"March 23. Mr. Carlisle presented a written report, to accompany 5237; which was read and approved. The bill (5237) and accompanying report (811) were reported to House, and placed on Calendar of Committee of Whole.

"March 31. The Commisioner of Internal Revenue, by invitation of committee, appeared for purpose of conference in relation to House bill 5237. This was a meeting specially set apart for conference with the Commissioner touching the provisions of the bill in question, the regular meeting of the committee having been held on Thursday, March 30. Several amendments were suggested by the Commissioner, and, after full discussion, were adopted. In order that the amendments might be incorporated in the bill, the chairman was instructed to move in the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole and recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, and the bill was accordingly recommitted.

"April 3. The amendments agreed to March 31, having been incorporated in the bill, it was again reported to the House in the form of a substitue (see House bill 5656) and passed under suspension of the rules—ayes 123, nays 29; the vote being by division."

Under these circumstances the committee might well be surprised to see it deliberately stated, without qualification or condition, in a formal resolution offered in the House, that "the proposed law will divert millions of the public money from its way into the United States Treasury, and donate the same to the large manufacturers and owners of distilled spirits, in violation of the agreement of the Republicans of the House."

If the bill can have the effect thus attributed to it this committee has either been deceived by the advocates of the measure or it has purposely deceived the House. In either case a great public wrong has been done, and it becomes the duty of the committee and the House to take all necessary steps to correct it at the earliest possible moment.

If, on the other hand, the charge made in the preamble to the resolution is without foundation in fact, it is certainly due to the committee and the House that it should be exposed. In order to enable the House to understand fully the purpose and effect of the bill, it will be necessary to examine it somewhat in detail. It contains four principal provisions, which we will state in their regular order, making proper explanations as we proceed.

1. An indefinite extension of the time during which distilled spirits may remain in bond. Under the existing internal-revenue laws distilled spirits is the only article upon which the Government requires the tax to be paid before it is actually sold or removed for sale or consumption. In every other case the manufacturer keeps the article in his own possession and under his own exclusive control, without the payment of any tax, until he chooses to sell it or remove it for consumption or sale. The manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, cigars, beer, matches, perfumery, cosmetics, &c., are permitted to hold their goods until there is a consumptive demand for them, and pay the tax only when they sell. As we shall see hereafter, none of them are required to execute any bonds except as manufacturers, and the Government does not have the custody or control of their products as it does in the case of distilled spirits. In all these cases the tax is strictly upon consumption, and the manufacturer or owner is permitted to take advantage of favorable markets and avoid unfavorable ones to the same extent precisely as if there were no tax upon his goods. This is undoubtedly the true principle of excise taxation. While the Government is justifiable in exacting its revenue, it is not justifiable in attempting to control the trade in a legitimate article of commerce by forcing the owner either to sell at a loss on the original cost of production or to permanently invest the amount of the tax in addition to that cost.

In his annual report for the year 1879 the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, speaking of deficiency taxes upon spirits withdrawn for exportation, used the following language:

"The intention of the internal-revenue laws is to levy a tax of 90 cents a gallon upon spirits which are manufactured for and actually go into consumption in this country, and the tax in question is evidently not intended for revenue, but as a restrictive measure to prevent fraud."

There appears to be no sufficient reason why the single article of distilled spirits should be excepted from the general rule applied to all other taxable products. It can not be for the mere purpose of preventing fraud on the revenue, for certainly there is not as much danger of a fraudulent removal of the property without the payment of the tax in a case where the Government itself has actual possession and control of it as in the cases where it is left in the custody of the manufacturer or owner under a bond that he will pay the tax when he sells or removes it. And so far as the cost of governmental supervision is involved, it is exactly the same, whether the spirits remain in the warehouse for one year or for an indefinite time. The compensation of the storekeeper is the same in amount in each case, and his constant attendance at the warehouse is required in both.

During the last fiscal year the consumption of distilled spirits in this country amounted to 67,372,575 gallons, the tax upon which was $62,214,127.56. About 12,000,000 gallons of these spirits consisted of what is known as bourbon and rye whiskies. On the 1st day of March last there was remaining in bond about 84,000,000 gallons of spirits, upon which the tax would amount to about $75,600,000. Much the greater part of this is bourbon and rye whisky. This vast accumulation of spirits in bond shows conclusively that the demand has not equaled the supply heretofore and does not equal it now; and yet, under the existing law, the article is being forced out of the warehouse, and the owners are being compelled to advance the tax upon before it can be sold.

In considering the question as to the propriety of extending the bonded period, it must be borne in mind that the Government can gain nothing whatever by forcing the owners to pay the tax before there is a demand for the article, for the obvious reason that the spirits thus forced out will constitute a stock in the market which must be consumed before another supply will be manufactured. If the Government were to compel the payment of the tax in every case immediately upon the production of the spirits, it would not in a series of years collect a dollar more than if it permitted the article to remain in the warehouse for an indefinite length of time.

In the first case, no more would be manufactured within a year than could be sold and consumed; while in the second, every gallon that could be sold or consumed would certainly be withdrawn from the warehouse during every year. In the end the result would be precisely the same, no matter which course is pursued by the Government. In the absence of fraudulent evasions of the tax, an actual diminution of the consumptive demand is the only thing that can possibly reduce the revenue. If all the spirits now in bond were to be immediately destroyed by fire or other casualty, the total amount of revenue would not be affected in the least, because its place would be at once supplied by a new product, and consumption would go on at the usual rate.

Suppose that the owners of the spirits now in bond shall be forced to pay 90 cents on the gallon, and remove them from the warehouse before there is an actual demand for them in the market, they will of course be compelled to sell them at such prices as they can obtain. They can not afford to hold for any considerable time an article in which they have been compelled to invest so much beyond its intrinsic value, and the consequence will be that they will necessarily put prices down to the lowest possible point, and sell in competition with the inferior grades of goods known as rectified and compounded spirits. To the extent that they compete with these other grades of spirits they necessarily prevent their consumption, and thus deprive the Government of the tax which those spirits would otherwise have yielded. It is manifest that the Treasury can gain nothing by a policy which forces the consumption of one kind of spirits instead of another so long as both kinds pay the same rate of tax, and it is equally manifest that the manufacturers and dealers in rectified and compounded spirits would be greatly injured by such a policy.

Appended to this report will be found a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting statements showing the quantity of spirits (84,532,246 gallons) in warehouse according to the latest reports received by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the quantity which, under the present law, must be withdrawn during each month up to the 1st day of May, 1883.

The Government has from the very beginning the possession of all the property upon which the tax is imposed. But this is not by any means all the security afforded by the law. Before the distiller can execute bond as such, or commence business at all, under the law he is required to give notice to the collector in writing, stating his name and residence, and if a company or firm, the name and residence of each member, the name and residence of every person interested or to be interested in the business, the precise place where the business is to be carried on, and if to be carried on in a city, the residence and place of business shall be indicated by the name of the street and number of the building. The notice must also state the kind of stills and the cubic contents thereof, the number and kind of boilers, the number of mash-tubs and fermenting-tubs, and the cubic contents of each tub, the number of receiving-cisterns and the cubic contents of each cistern, the number of hours in which the distillery will ferment each tub of mash or beer, the estimated quantity of distilled spirits which the apparatus is capable of distilling every twenty-four hours, a particular description of the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, and of the buildings thereon, including their size, material, and construction, and that the distillery premises are not within six hundred feet in a direct line of any premises authorized to be used for rectifying distilled spirits by any process. (Section 3259 Revised Statutes.)

Having given this notice and furnished this description of the property proposed to be used, the parties must next comply with section 3262 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that no bond of a distiller shall be approved unless he is the owner in fee, unencumbered by any mortage, judgment, or other lien, of the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, or unless he files with the collector in connection with his notice the written consent of the owner of the fee, and of any mortgage or judgment creditor, or other person having a lien thereon, duly acknowledged, that the premises may be used for the purpose of distilling spirits subject to the provisions of law, and expressly stipulating that the lien of the United States for taxes and penalties shall have priority of such mortgage, judgment, or other incumbrance, and that in case of the forfeiture of the distillery premises or any part thereof the title of the same shall vest in the United States discharged from such mortgage, judgment, or other incumbrance. It then provides that in any case where the owner of a distillery or distilling apparatus, erected prior to the 20th day of June, 1868, has only an estate for a term of years or other estate less than fee-simple in the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, the evidence of title to which shall have been duly recorded prior to that date; or in any case of such prior erection where the title was then and has continued to be in litigation; or in any case of such prior erection where such owner is possessed of the fee, but encumbered with a mortgage executed and duly recorded prior to said 20th day of June, 1868, and not due; or in any case of such prior erection where the fee is held by a feme covert, minor, person of unsound mind, or other person incapable of giving consent, the value of such lot or tract of land, together with the building and distilling apparatus, shall be appraised in a manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the collector may, at the discretion of the Commissioner, be authorized to accept, in lieu of the written consent of the owner of the fee, the bond of such distiller in such form as the Commissioner may prescribe, with not less than two sureties, conditioned that in case the distillery, distilling apparatus, or any part thereof, shall by final judgment be forfeited for the violation of any of the provisions of law, the obligors shall pay the amount stated in such bond.

Then section 3251 provides that every proprietor or possessor of, and every person in any manner interested, in the use of any still, distillery, or distilling apparatus, shall be jointly and severally liable for the taxes imposed by law on the distilled spirits produced therefrom, and the tax shall be a first lien on the spirits distilled, the distillery used for distilling the same, the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, the lot or tract of land whereon the said distillery is situated, and on any building thereon, from the time said spirits are in existence as such until the tax is paid.

But in case a new bond shall not be executed at the end of the year as required by the bill, the tax, as we have already stated, becomes at once due, and under existing laws the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has the power to make assessments in all such cases. When an assessment is made and the tax is not paid it is the duty of the collector to add a penalty of 5 per cent. to the amount of the tax and proceed to make distraint therefor, together with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month. Sections 3186, 3187, 3188, and 3189 of the Revised Statutes prescribes what liens and remedies the Government shall have in all such cases. Those sections are as follows:

"SEC. 3186. If any person liable to pay any tax neglects or refuses to pay the same after demand, the amount shall be a lien in favor of the United States from the time when the assessment-list was received by the collector, except when otherwise provided, until paid, with the interest, penalties, and costs that may accrue in addition thereto, upon all property and rights to property belonging to such person.

"SEC. 3187. If any person liable to pay any taxes neglects or refuses to pay the same within ten days after notice and demand, it shall be lawful for the collector or his deputy to collect the said taxes, with 5 per cent. additional thereto, and interest as aforesaid, by distraint and sale, in the manner hereafter provided, of the goods, chattels, or effects, including stocks, securities, and evidences of debt, of the person delinquent as aforesaid: Provided, That there shall be exempt from distraint and sale, if belonging to the head of a family, the schoolbooks and wearing apparel necessary for such family; also arms for personal use, one cow, two hogs, five sheep, and the wool thereof, provided the aggregate market value of said sheep shall not exceed $50; the necessary food for such cow, hogs, and sheep for a period not exceeding thirty days; fuel to an amount not greater in value than $25; provisions to an amount not greater than $50; household furniture kept for use to an amount not greater than $300; and the books, tools, or implements of a trade or profession, to an amount not greater than $100, shall also be exempt; and the officer making the distraint shall summon three disinterested householders of the vicinity, who shall appraise and set apart to the owner the amount of property herein declared to be exempt.

"SEC. 3188. In such case of neglect or refusal, the collector may levy, or by warrant may authorize a deputy collector to levy, upon all property and rights to property, except such as are exempt by the preceding section, belonging to such person, or on which the said lien exists, for the payment of the sum due as aforesaid, with interest and penalty for non-payment, and also of such further sum as shall be sufficient for the fees, costs, and expenses of such levy.

"SEC. 3189. All persons and officers of companies or corporations are required, on demand of a collector or deputy collector about to distrain or having distrained on any property or rights of property, to exhibit all books containing evidence or statements relating to the subject of distraint, or the property or rights of property liable to distraint for the tax due as aforesaid."

It thus appears that, whether there is a warehouse bond or not, the Government has the following security for the payment of the tax:

First. The possession of and the right to sell the whole quantity of spirits upon which the tax is due.

Second. The joint and several personal liability of every person interested in the production of the spirits.

Third. The first lien from the time the spirits are in existence on the distillery used in distilling the spirits, together with its machinery and fixtures, and the tract or lot of land on which it is situated, including all buildings thereon.

Fourth. A lien from the time when the assessment list is received by the collector upon all the property and rights of property belonging to the person or persons liable for the payment of the tax, and this includes not only goods, chattels, and real estate, but also stocks, securities, and evidences of debt.

But under the bill, as reported by this committee and passed by the House, there can never, under any circumstances, be a moment when the Government has not a bond. If the warehouseman fails to execute a new bond, as required by the bill, such failure of itself constitutes a breach of the condition in the old bond and the sureties remain liable on that obligation.

In order to show how much greater this security is than that exacted by the Government from the manufacturers and custodians of other taxable articles, it is only necessary to refer to the statutes now in force upon this subject. Manufacturers of tobacco who, as already stated, are permitted to keep their products in their own possession and under their own control until sold or removed for consumption or sale, are required by law to execute a bond, to be approved by the collector of the district, in the sum of not less than $2,000 nor more than $20,000, to be fixed by the collector, according to the quantum of business proposed to be done by the manufacturer, and conditioned that he shall not engage in any attempt, by himself or by collusion with others, to defraud the Government of any tax on his manufactures; that he shall render truly and correctly all the returns, statements, and inventories prescribed by law or regulations; that whenever he adds to the number of cutting-machines, presses, snuff-mills, hand-mills, or other mills or machines used by him, he shall immediately give notice thereof to the collector of the district; that he shall stamp, in accordance with law, all tobacco and snuff manufactured by him before he removes any part thereof from the place of manufacture; that he shall not knowingly sell, purchase, expose, or receive for sale any manufactured tobacco or snuff which has not been stamped as required by law, and that he shall comply with all the requirements of law relating to the manufacture of tobacco or snuff.

It will thus be seen that the largest manufacturers of tobacco in the United States are not required to execute any bonds exceeding the sum of $20,000, although the annual taxes upon their products may, and in a great number of instances actually do, amount to many times that sum. Brewers of ale, beer, and other fermented liquors are required, on the 1st day of May in each year, to execute a bond, to be approved by the collector of the district, in a sum equal to twice the amount of the tax which, in the opinion of the collector, they will be liable to pay during any one month, and conditioned that the obligor shall pay, or cause to be paid, the tax required by law on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other fermented liquors made by or for him before the same is sold or removed for consumption or sale, and that he shall keep the books required by law, and in all respects faithfully comply, without fraud or evasion, with all requirements of law relating to the manufacture and sale of any malt liquors. This class of manufacturers likewise retain the possession and control of their products until they actually sell them or remove them for sale.

Manufacturers of cigars are required to give bond in such penal sum as the collector may require, not less than $500, with an additional $100 for each person proposed to be employed by him in making cigars, conditioned that he shall not engage in any attempt, by himself or by collusion with others, to defraud the Government of any tax on his manufactures; that he shall render correctly all the returns, statements, and inventories prescribed; that he will give notice of any additional number of cigar-makers employed by him; that he shall stamp, in accordance with law, all cigars manufactured by him before he offers the same, or any part thereof, for sale, and before he removes any part thereof from the place of manufacture; and that he shall comply with all requirements of law relating to the manufacture of cigars.

The manufacturers of matches, proprietary medicines, perfumeries, cosmetics, &c., are not required to execute any bond whatever. In fact the manufacturers of friction matches, cigar-lights, and wax-tapers are allowed to procure their stamps from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on a credit of sixty days, upon the execution of a bond in his office for the payment of the amount at the end of that time, and if they purchase at any one time over five hundred dollars' worth of stamps they are allowed a discount of 10 per cent. on the whole amount purchased.

These provisons have been found ample to secure the payment of the tax on all classes of articles to which they relate, and, so far as the committee is advised, the revenue authorities are entirely satisfied with them. In the case of distilled spirits the law is much more stringent, and the security of the Government, as we have just seen, is much greater. The revenue system is now so perfect that it is absolutely impossible to remove spirits from the warehouse without the knowledge and connivance of the officials in charge, and even then the fraud would certainly be detected.

But it has been urged that in case of a general failure to execute new bonds the Government would be compelled to offer for sale such large quantities of spirits as to break down the market and reduce the price below the amount of the tax. In response to this assertion, for it is a mere assertion, it is only necessary to say that under the law no revenue officer is authorized in any case to sell distilled spirits for less than the whole amount of the tax due upon it.

Section 3334 of the Revised Statutes provides that "all distilled spirits forfeited to the United States, sold by order of court, or under process of distraint, shall be sold subject to tax; and the purchaser shall immediately, and before he takes possession of said spirits, pay the tax thereon. And any distilled spirits heretofore condemned, and now in the possession of the United States, shall be sold as herein provided. If any tax-paid stamps are affixed to any cask or package so condemned, such stamps shall be obliterated and destroyed by the collector or marshal after forfeiture, and before such sale: Provided, That in all cases wherein it shall appear that any distilled spirits offered for sale on distraint for taxes, where the taxes on such spirits have not been paid, or offered for sale for the benefit of the United States as forfeited spirits under order of court or under proceeding pursuant to section 3460 of the Revised Statutes, will not, by reason of such spirits being below proof, bring a price equal to the tax due and payable thereon, but will bring a price equal to, or greater than, the tax on said spirits, computed only upon the proof-gallons contained in the packages without regard to the greater number of wine-gallons contained therein, then, and in such case, upon sale being so made, tax-paid stamps to the amount required to stamp such spirits as if the tax thereon were only on the proof-gallons thereof, may, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall prescribe, be used by the collector making such sale, or furnished by a collector to a United States marshal, or to any other Government officer making such sale for the benefit of the United States without making payment for said stamps so used or delivered. Any collector using or furnishing stamps in manner aforesaid, on presenting vouchers satisfactory to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be allowed credit for the same in settling his stamp account with the Department. In such cases the officers selling the distilled spirits shall affix, or cause to be affixed, to the same the tax-paid stamps so provided, and shall write across the face of such stamps the true number of proof and wine gallons contained in the package, the amount of tax actually paid thereon, and also the words 'Affixed under provisions of act of ——, 1879' (inserting the date of the approval of this act)."

The spirits must, therefore, in every case be sold subject to the tax, and there is no legal means by which it can enter into the commerce of the country unless the package containing it bears a stamp showing the payment of 90 cents on every gallon of its contents. It follows, therefore, clearly that the Government can not possibly lose the tax or any part of it. So long as the internal-revenue laws remain in force a package of distilled spirits found anywhere in the United States without a stamp upon it showing the payment of the tax in full will be liable to instant seizure and forfeiture, and the owner will be personally liable to heavy penalties.

Fourth. The bill proposes to extend the maximum allowance for leakage and evaporation until the end of eight years instead of three years, as now provided by the act of May 28, 1880. The law prescribing a maximum allowance for loss of spirits by leakage and evaporation has been in force nearly two years, and its operation has been, so far as the committee has been able to ascertain, satisfactory alike to the tax-payers and the revenue authorities. From July 20, 1868, to May 28, 1880, the owners of distilled spirits were required by law to pay a tax on the whole quantity entered in the warehouse, although a large part of it may have been actually lost by leakage and evaporation while in the custody of the Government officials.

The seventeenth section of the act last mentioned required the spirits to be regauged when withdrawn, and established a scale of maximum allowances. In its report upon that bill this committee used the following language:

"A brief review of the former legislation upon this subject will show that the principle upon which the eighteenth section of the present bill is based is not a new one in this country, except in so far as it limits the measure of allowance for evaporation and leakage, and a reference to the existing internal-revenue laws imposing taxes upon manufactured articles other than distilled spirits will show that the same just and equitable rule is still applied to all of them.

"The forty-first section of the act of July 1, 1862, provided that there should be paid on all spirits that might be distilled and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, of first proof, on and after the 1st day of August, 1862, a tax of 20 cents on each gallon, and that it should be paid by the owner, agent, or superintendent at the still or other vessel in which such spirits might be distilled at the time of rendering the accounts of spirituous liquors as required by the act (12 Statutes, page 447). The forty-fifth section of the same act required these accounts of the distiller to be rendered on the first, tenth, and twentieth days of each month (12 Statutes, page 448). Under this section, and others contained in that law, no duty was exacted on spirits in warehouse until there was a sale or removal for sale or consumption, and then only upon the number of gallons actually sold or removed."

"The twelfth section of the amendatory act of March 3, 1863, expressly authorized the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make rules and regulations providing for deductions on account of leakage from the quantity of spirituous liquors subject to taxation under the act to which it was an amendment, not exceeding 5 per cent., of the amount removed for sale; and it was provided that the deduction should be so adjusted in different parts of the United States as to be proportioned as nearly as practicable to the distances over which the manufacturer usually transferred such liquors for the wholesale thereof (12 Statutes, page 723). This, it will be observed, extended the principle a step further than the former law, and allowed for loss by leakage up to the time when the spirits had actually reached a market. Then followed the act of March 3, 1864, which returned to the principle of the act of 1862, and provided for a tax of $60 cents per gallon on all spirits that might be distilled and sold or distilled and removed for consumption or sale prior to the 1st day of the next July, and under this law the tax was imposed only on the spirits inspected out of the bonded warehouse when removed for sale or consumption.

"The act of June 30, 1864, increased the tax to $1.50 per gallon, but made no change in the law as to allowances for evaporation and leakage; nor did the act of July 13, 1866, make any alteration of the law in this respect.

"Under these laws the tax was collected only on the quantity of spirits withdrawn from the warehouse, as is shown by the official circulars and instructions issued from the office of the Commissioner. In a circular dated February 1, 1866, relating to bonded warehouse accounts, the collectors were directed to take credit 'for leakage and loss of spirits in transport, and which stand in the warehouse;' and in the same document it was provided that 'all actual loss of spirits or coal-oil from leakage while in bonded warehouse will be allowed upon the proper certificate of the inspector;' and again, in the regulations of August 29, 1867, collectors were authorized to allow for leakage, when it did not 'exceed 1 per cent. per month for each month the merchandise has been in store.' Any loss in excess of that amount was to be allowed by the Commissioner himself instead of the collector.

"This was the state of the law and the practice under it until July 20, 1868, when Congress passed an act the fourth section of which declared that distilled spirits, spirits, alcohol, and alcoholic spirits, within the true intent and meaning of this act, is that substance known as ethyl alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl, or spirit of wine, which is commonly produced by the fermentation of grain, starch, molasses, or sugar, including all dilutions and mixtures of this substance, and that the tax should attach to this substance as soon as it is in existence as such, whether it be subsequently separated as pure or impure spirit, or be immediately or at some subsequent time transferred into any other substance, either in the process of original production or by any subsequent process (15 Statutes, page 126).

"The latter part of the section just mentioned, declaring that the tax 'shall attach to this substance as soon as it is in existence as such,' established for the first time in our legislation upon this subject a rule which makes a great discrimination against distilled spirits as to the manner of assessing internal-revenue taxes, and subjects the manufacturers of that article to the evil of which they now complain. According to the letter of this law, the tax attaches to the alcohol as it exists in the mash while in the fermenting-tubs, and before it has been separated from the other substances by the process of distillation; and in accordance with this interpretation the distiller is now in many instances actually required to pay tax upon the spirits which ought to have been produced from the mash, although the entire fermented matter may have been lost or destroyed by accident, and without fraud or negligence upon his part. This injustice is accomplished by assessing him as for a deficiency in not having produced 80 per cent. of the surveyed capacity of his distillery as established by law.

"As already intimated, this rule, which makes the tax attach to the article as soon as it has an existence, and without reference to its sale or consumption or removal for sale or consumption, is exceptional in our legislation, and applies only to distilled spirits. In the case of tobacco and snuff, articles upon which many millions of dollars are annually collected, the law provides for the collection of a tax only upon the quantities 'manufactured and sold or removed for consumption and sale,' and the manufacturer is permitted to retain them in his own possession, without the payment of tax, for as long a time as his interests or fancy may dictate. The law is the same with regard to fermented liquors, cigars, medicines, or preparations, perfumery, cosmetics, matches, wax-tapers, playing cards, &c. 'Manufactured and sold,' or 'made and sold, or removed for consumption or sale,' is the language of the law in all cases except distilled spirits; so that, with this single exception, the uniform and settled policy of the Government is to levy and collect internal-revenue taxes only upon manufactured articles which actually enter into consumption in this country, or are removed for consumption or sale in this country.

"During the present session, Congress, by the almost unanimous vote of both Houses, has reaffirmed this just policy by the passage of a bill allowing for loss by leakage while spirits are being transported to the port of shipment for exportation. The question of taxation upon exports could not affect the principle of that bill in the least, for the obvious reason that spirits actually lost by leakage or otherwise, and for which the allowance is to be made, can not be exported. It can only be vindicated upon the general ground that the citizen ought not to be compelled to pay an excise tax upon an article which can neither be sold nor consumed. This is undoubtedly the true policy, and is in strict accordance with the principles which underlie every just system of taxation; for upon no other theory or plan can the public burdens be properly distributed among those who ought rightfully to bear them. To tax the citizen upon a particular manufactured article simply because he has manufactured it, when, without fault or negligence of his, he can neither sell nor consume it, is to compel him to contribute more than his just proportion toward the support of the Government. When, however, the tax is collected upon the article sold or consumed, every one who purchases, or in any way uses it, necessarily pays his share of the duty.

"But the existing system, erroneous as it is in principle, has not even the merit of being uniform in its operation upon all classes of distillers. Notwithstanding the positive declaration of the act of July 20, 1868, that the tax shall attach to the spirits or alcohol as soon as it exists, there is another section of the law which, by construction, exempts a large class of distillers from the payment of a tax upon the whole product of the grain used in their establishments, and secures to them in every case an absolute allowance of from 3 to 5 per cent. upon the entire quantity of spirits manufactured. These distillers complete the manufacture of their spirits and prepare it for market by the process of continuous distillation; that is, they not only distill but also rectify, purify, or refine the spirits.

"The ordinary distillers of high wines, rye, wheat, bourbon, and other grain-flavored spirits are required by the law, as already stated, to convey the product of the still directly to the receiving cistern, from which it is drawn off by the gauger, in the presence of the storekeeper, into casks or packages, and immediately marked, branded, and gauged for taxation, without any allowance whatever for waste or absorption; but the continuous distiller is permitted to conduct the spirits produced by him from the still to the tub or cistern, and thence to the rectifying, purifying, or refining apparatus; and after it has been subjected to that additional process it is for the first time marked, branded, and gauged for taxation.

"From the time it leaves the still until it is gauged, after rectification and purification, there is a waste of from 3 to 5 per cent., or from one and a quarter to two gallons, in each package of forty gallons. This gives to the continuous distiller a great advantage over others who manufacture only high wines, rye, wheat, or bourbon spirits, because when the latter pay a tax upon one hundred gallons as it comes from the still he pays only upon ninety-five, or at the most ninety-seven, gallons; and, besides, he has so refined and purified his article that it is ready to go on the market for immediate sale and consumption.

"The bill reported will place all distillers upon precisely the same footing in this respect, by requiring all alike to pay the tax only upon the quantity sold or removed for consumption or sale, whether it be refined and prepared for the market by the mechanical process just mentioned or otherwise.

"It is a fact worthy of serious consideration in this connection, as tending to show the gross injustice resulting to domestic distillers, rectifiers, and dealers from the operation of the present law, that foreign traders may now purchase untaxed spirits in this country, or receive a drawback if the tax has been paid, with allowances for leakage between the warehouse and port of shipment, export it to a European or other port, keep it as many years as may be desirable to give it age and value, and then reimport it, have it gauged at the customs warehouse, and pay a tax of 90 cents per gallon upon the actual contents of each package. In this way the foreign dealer receives the benefit of the whole amount of evaporation and leakage, is exempt from the payment of interest upon the tax, and finally places the spirits, greatly increased in value by age, upon the American market in competition with the domestic distiller and dealer, who have been compelled to pay a tax upon the original quantity contained in the packages, and interest upon that tax besides. The whole cost of exporting the article to Liverpool and reimporting it into this country will not exceed the interest which the home producer or owner is compelled to pay on the tax, so that the foreign parties actually secure by the operation a clear advantage of from seven and a half to ten gallons on each package of forty gallons.

"This proceeding is authorized by section 2500 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that upon the reimportation of articles once exported, of the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, upon which no internal revenue has been assessed or paid, or upon which such tax has been paid and refunded by allowance or drawback, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty equal to the tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws upon such articles. Under this statute and the decisions of the Treasury Department upon the subject large quantities of domestic distilled spirits have already been sent from this country to Liverpool and to the Bermudas and other places, and, after remaining there in bond for a sufficient length of time to become purified and refined by age, have returned to our ports and paid the internal-revenue tax, with a full allowance for evaporation, leakage, and other loss."

The bill lately passed by the House does not increase the maximum allowances in any case, but merely extends the period for which they may be made from three years to eight years, and provides that after that time no allowance or deduction shall be made. The spirits are to be regauged as provided by the existing law, and if it shall be found that there has been a loss without the fault or negligence of the distiller or owner the tax is to be collected only on the quantity of distilled spirits contained in the cask or package at the time of the withdrawal; but in no case can the allowance exceed the quantity named in the bill, even though there may have been, in fact, a loss of double that quantity.

On the other hand, if it shall be ascertained by the regauge that less than the quantity mentioned in the bill has been lost, the allowance can be made only for the actual deficiency. Each package must be regauged and its contents accounted for separately, so that it is impossible under any circumstances for the owner or distiller to secure an allowance for more than is actually lost; while it may often happen, and in fact does often happen in the practical administration of the law, that he is compelled to pay the tax on spirits wholly lost by leakage and evaporation. For instance, if a number of packages have remained in the warehouses for two years and when regauged it is ascertained that one of them has lost two gallons, another three gallons, and another ten gallons, making an actual loss of fifteen in all, yet the distiller or owner will, under the bill, receive an allowance of only ten and one-half gallons. That is, he will be allowed only the actual loss on the first two packages, and the maximum quantity, five and a half gallons, allowed by the bill on the third one.

It will be seen, therefore, that the question of average losses by leakage or evaporation does not enter into the consideration of this subject at all. There are no average allowances; the distiller or dealer who has five thousand packages in the warehouse is in this respect in precisely the same situation as the distiller or dealer who has only one package. Each separate package will be allowed for its own loss of contents, unless it exceeds the quantity prescribed by the bill for the time it has been in the warehouse; and if it should exceed that quantity the owner must pay the tax on the excess without regard to the fact that some other package has lost less than the maximum allowance.

In this connection it is proper to call attention to section 3293 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 5, 1879, under which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has the right at any time when he believes that there has been an excessive loss of distilled spirits from any cask or package to require the immediate withdrawal of such spirits from the warehouse and the payment of the tax upon the original quantity entered. So much of the section as relates to this subject is as follows:

"If it shall appear at any time that there has been a loss of distilled spirits from any cask or other package hereafter deposited in a distillery warehouse, other than the loss provided for in section 3221 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, is excessive, he may instruct the collector of the district in which the loss has occurred to require the withdrawal from warehouse of such spirits, and to collect the tax accrued upon the original quantity of distilled spirits entered into the warehouse in such cask or package, together with the interest accrued thereon, if any, notwithstanding that the time specified in any bond given for the withdrawal of the spirits entered into warehouse in such cask or package has not expired. If the said tax and interest are not paid on demand, the collector shall report the amount due upon his next monthly list, and it shall be assessed and collected as other taxes are assessed and collected."

The preamble and resolution referred to the committee recites a letter written by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to a member of the House of Representatives, in response to an inquiry made by the member touching the bill we have been considering, and the resolution itself calls upon the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the House his views on the subject-matter of the letter, and the conduct of the head of the Internal Revenue Bureau, "as to what improper influences, if any, were brought to bias his judgment in writing the same." In the opinion of the committee the passage of such a resolution would be a most unwarrantable imputation upon the conduct of an officer against whom no charge is made, either in the resolution itself or elsewhere, so far as the committee is advised.

The Commissioner is an impeachable officer, and if there is reason to believe that he has, in this or any other case, been improperly influenced to give his official indorsement to a measure pending before Congress, it is the duty of every one who possesses knowledge of the fact, or who has reasonable ground to believe that he has been so influenced, to prefer charges against him at once, in order that a proper investigation may be made. To call upon one officer of the Government to make an ex parte statement to the House concerning the motives of another is not only without precedent, but without excuse, in the opinion of the committee.

It appears from the letter of the Commissioner, incorporated in the preamble of the resolution, that it was written in response to an inquiry made by a member of the House, and the committee fails to discover, either in its contents or in the circumstances under which it was written, anything whatever conducing to show that improper influences or means had been used to procure it. In the absence of any reason to suspect the motives or conduct of the Commissioner in relation to this measure, it would be grossly unjust to give the sanction of the House to such a resolution as the one under consideration, even if it conformed to the regular course of proceeding in cases of alleged official malfeasance.

The committee considers it a matter of simple justice to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to say that he did not at any time while the bill was pending make any communication or suggestion in relation to it, except when called upon to do so by the committee or its members, and that in every instance the alterations and additions suggested by him and adopted by the committee were made in the interest of the Government. He was consulted in his official capacity alone, the object of the committee being to secure his advice and co-operation in the preparation of a bill which would not in any manner impair the security of the Government for the collection of the tax, and at the same time afford what was believed to be a proper means of relief to the tax-payers.

The committee therefore reports the resolution back to the House with the recommendation that it be not adopted.

WESTERN EXPORT ASSOCIATION.

RIVERTON, ILL., October 1, 1883.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, president of the Western Export Association, a body embracing every distiller in the Northern States, would respectfully represent to you that common cause has been made with the Kentucky Distillers' Association, and which has the active co-operation of all the distillers of the Southern States, in asking of Congress the passage of a bill extending the bonded period on whisky now in bond for two years.

You will remember this bill passed the United States Senate at the last session, but never came to a vote in the House, and was consequently lost for want of action.

The passage of this measure was strongly urged by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by the National Board of Trade, by the boards of trade in the principal cities throughout the Union, and by bankers and business men generally in the States in which this interest is largely represented.

The amount of whisky in bond is so great that it is impossible to get it into consumption in the time specified by law, and unless Congress grants relief many firms will be ruined, and widespread disaster will be the consequence.

It is of no use to inquire into the causes which have occasioned this overproduction. We have booms and panics in this country, one as senseless as the other, and it was during one of these booms that this overproduction took place. The whisky States have not made a third of a crop the past season, and the Western States have but little in bond. We are preventing an overproduction for the future, but what is done can not be remedied.

Were it any other article of merchandise we would simply wait until there was a market for it, but in this case when the time is up the tax must be paid and the goods forced out whether there is a demand for them or not.

It is not a question of temperance, for as long as the Government collects $80,000,000 from this article, the manufacturers of it are entitled to consideration, besides which the Government will be a large gainer by the transaction. Experience has proven that the evaporation in three years in the process of aging amounts to 7½ gallons to the barrel, which is the limit allowed by law. From this it is safe to estimate the evaporation in the two subsequent years, for which there is no allowance made, at four gallons to the barrel, which at 90 cents tax would make $3.60 on every barrel, and as there are one and one-half million barrels in bond, the gain to the Government can easily be computed.

The demand last year was 75,000,000 gallons of spirits, and whether these goods are forced out or not, a sufficient quantity of goods will always be on hand to supply the market. The Western States can produce twice as many goods as can be sold, and the Government will receive its full amount of revenue.

Yours, respectfully, H. B. MILLER.

THE BONDED SPIRITS.

The spirit of the opposition in Eastern journals to the extension of the time of bonded domestic spirits indicates that this country is so great that journalists in the East can not become informed on its great business interests, or that the journalist of the seaboard stands with his back to the interior and West. The narrow view and the plentiful lack of information on this important manufacture and leading source of revenue are in strange contrast with the customary ascriptions to the modern means for the spread of intelligence, and to the increase of knowledge thereby.

The tone of opposition is as if the distillers were trying to rob the Government; as if they were brazenly asking the Government to lend them an amount of money equal to the taxes; as if they were asking the Government to "carry them," in the banking sense; as if they had conspired to manufacture spirits greatly in excess of the consumption, in order to put it in bond; as if the banks were in collusion with them in this conspiracy of overproduction against the public welfare, and were asking the Government to extend the bonded time in order to relieve them from just penalty for their evil doings.

To common intelligence and common sense the mere statement of these arguments shows their absurdity; but the above is no overstatement of the arguments used by Eastern journals which assume to be competent to guide public opinion in all affairs of state. And some Western journals follow them as sheep the bell-wether. To keep imported goods in bond without payment of duties until such a time as the importer shall desire to withdraw them for consumption is thought all right, as in fact it is. Yet the importer has not the liability of being compelled to import in excess by having a great manufactory on his hands which can not stop without great loss. In general he has no reason for importing in excess of consumption, save speculation.

Besides, our finance system intends to discourage rather than encourage imports, as injurious to domestic industry. The manufacturers of spirits ask no more than would be equitable in relation to imports. Imported goods are ready for consumption. The better kinds of spirits, such as are used for drink, require age to fit them for use. This is part of the process of manufacture. To give the owners equity with importers the limit of bonding time should be calculated from the time when the spirits are fit for consumption.

What they ask is consonant with the maxim of scientific taxation; that taxes on consumption should be laid as near as possible to the stage of consumption, because in the end the consumer has to pay for all the additional cost in putting on the taxes in the earlier stages. The Government, for its own convenience, lays on this tax at the manufactory. This is a variation from the maxim, and is solely for the convenience of the Government in collecting, and is not to make the tax higher to the consumer. But because it departs from the true rule it need not add other demands to make the tax still more onerous.

The Government keeps this maxim in the taxes on imports by letting them be stored in bond without payment of duties until withdrawn for consumption. The rate of the tax on spirits is enormous. It is as much as 300 or 400 per cent. on the cost. He who makes a barrel of forty gallons of sprits, costing eight or ten dollars, must pay to the Government $36 before he is allowed to put it into the market to start it on its way to the consumers, from whom in minute portions this tax is to come back. This puts on the manufacturer a great financial burden in addition to all the capital required to carry on the manufacture.

A little reckoning will give an idea of the vast amount of capital which is thus tied up. To tie it up for years is surely no gain to the Government and no benefit to general business. To reduce this locking up of capital to the lowest practicable amount and time is for the general welfare.

To answer the accusation of overproduction seems an indignity to the human mind, yet the accusation is ringing round the land, and is seriously made by journals and statesmen who have contempt for the unintelligent.

The common report is of overproduction in all lines of domestic manufactures—iron, woolen, cotton, wood, leather, and so on; but overproduction is not charged against these as an offense or a conspiracy. People see that great establishments can not be run closely on the hand-to-mouth rule, keeping on the ragged edge of consumption. The public regard the overproducers as a meritorious class. At times importations also are greatly overdone; but although this is thought evil to home industry, no warfare is made on the importers.

These zealous assailants are not intelligent in the nature of the distilling business. It requires a large investment of capital in the plant; the use of large capital in the purchase of grain and other stock; a large capital in the purchase of cattle and hogs for feeding; it enters into contracts ahead for the purchase or the feeding of cattle and hogs; it employs a large working force of men and animals; it has coopering and other industries connected with it, with all the advance buying of stock for them; its works deteriorate rapidly by stopping the use.

The business has to use banking credit, all of which has to be liquidated when production ceases. It can not suspend without great loss. Because of its various connections with animals and contracts it may be forced to run for a long time when the manufacture of spirits is at a loss. Like all other well-founded manufactures, it keeps running in adverse times, looking for better, in order to keep its men employed and save its property from decay. Thus in this, as in other manufactures, overproduction is a claim to the public favor, instead of a cause for Government hostility.

To compel the distillers to take out of bond a quantity of spirits which would break down the market in order to pay the tax is not a temperance measure, yet the prohibition feeling enters blindly into this opposition to extending the bonded period. But the bitterest and blindest opposition comes from journals which think themselves liberal and intelligent. They would treat these manufacturers as public enemies, and would ruin them to force sixty or ninety millions more into the enormous Treasury surplus which is now generating all sorts of prodigal schemes to get rid of it.

The charge has been made that while the manufacturers have been asking an extension of the bonded period they have increased the production. In this statement they are called a ring. People must be standing on their heads when manufacturers who continue overproduction to avoid turning workmen out of employ and to prevent the decay of their property are held guilty of an offense against the public and are called a ring. But, in fact, the Secretary of the Treasury's annual report states that the production of the fiscal year ending June 30 was less than that of the previous year by 31,839,853 gallons, and than of 1881 by 43,714,842 gallons. To defend the manufacturers it is necessary to state this, which in reality is a public misfortune, as it represents a large reduction in employment of labor and in the market for farm products.

The extension of the bonded period is in accord with the maxim of public finance and with public policy. It is for a manufacture which in all the relations to other industries and general business, and in the conversion of crude products to higher values, has the same elements of public wealth as all other manufactures. Never was the opposition to a measure of public finance so devoid of intelligence and reason.

S. R. R.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I did not, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, see fit to make a minority report on this bill. Knowing that reports are too often cast aside without examination by members, I preferred to state my objections on the floor of the House.

We are asked to extend the time for the payment of tax on 70,000,000 gallons of whisky—to give an extension in addition to the three years allowed under the present law. The sum of money involved amounts to $66,000,000. In the beginning of this system of taxation the rule was adopted of collecting the tax on this article when it was put upon the market for consumption. The frauds connected with the "whisky ring" brought the Government to a different policy, and a limit of one year was fixed. In 1878 the period of three years was adopted as the law of the land. The result of that legislation was predicted shortly afterward by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in his report of November 24, 1880. There had been an increase of 5,000,000 gallons in 1879 as compared with 1878. There would probably be an increase of 13,000,000 gallons in 1880 over 1879. Even so early as that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue said:

The steady increase in the number and capacity of distilleries in operation suggests the probability of the continued enlargement of the stock on hand. It has occurred to me that this business was on the eve of being overdone, and that in the event of a recurrence of the agitation for a reduction of the tax the holders of these spirits will be in danger of loss.

Such was the warning of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at that period. Let us see how timely that warning was and how well it would have been if it had been heeded. What was the condition of the whisky in the country at that time? Let me read a statement of the quantity of spirits in warehouses at the beginning of the fiscal year 1879, with the quantity produced, &c.

| | Gallons. | Gallons. |
|---|---|---|
| Quantity of spirits actually in warehouses beginning of fiscal year | | 14,088,773 |
| Quantity of spirits produced during fiscal year | | 71,892,621 |
| Total | | 85,981,394 |
| Quantity of spirits withdrawn, tax-paid, during fiscal year | 51,885,939 | |
| Quantity of spirits withdrawn for exportation during fiscal year | 14,837,581 | |
| Quantity of spirits withdrawn for scientific purposes, for use of the United States, for transfer to manufacturing warehouse, destroyed by fire, allowed for loss by leakage in warehouses, &c | 45,404 | |
| Total | | 66,768,924 |
| Quantity of spirits remaining in warehouses at end of fiscal year | | 19,212,470 |

It thus appears that at the end of that fiscal year there remained in the bonded warehouses, in round numbers, only 19,000,000 gallons. Under the operation of the three years' extension there remained in the bonded warehouses at the end of the next year 31,000,000 gallons. In 1881 the quantity remaining in bond had increased to 64,000,000 gallons; in 1882, 87,000,000 gallons; and in 1883 there remained in bonded warehouses 80,000,000 gallons.

How well did the Commissioner of Internal Revenue foresee what would take place. There was an increase of production, an increase beyond the wants of the trade. There was a depreciation in price; there was an excess of production beyond what the public would consume. This is not a strange condition.

This is not peculiar to gentlemen who have invested their capital in the manufacture of whisky. Time and again, sir, but for the homestead laws of my State, thousands of men would have been deprived of all they had. Often have we seen merchants, by excessive and imprudent sales, involve themselves in bankruptcy and ruin. Frequently have we found the people of this country engaged in the manufacture and production of goods far beyond the public demand, and when they manufactured more than they could sell, when the supply was greater than the demand, of course, in obedience to well-known laws, there was depreciation of price and consequent serious loss to the manufacturers. Millions of dollars invested heedlessly in new railroad enterprises throughout this country have wrecked the fortunes of men who have been led indiscreetly to invest their capital in them.

Mr. EATON. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. Suppose an amendment were offered to this bill compelling the payment in advance, say quarterly or semi-annually, of the tax, would not that tend to prevent the accumulation of whisky in bond?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt that is true.

Mr. EATON. Such an amendment will be offered at the proper time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have a great deal to say, and if, within the limited time I have under the rule, I can get to that amendment before I take my seat, I will take pleasure in discussing it.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that it is nothing strange or peculiar that men who have invested their capital recklessly and beyond the demand of the market in anything should come to suffer loss and be subjected to a great many embarrassments.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. I should prefer to continue my remarks, but will yield to my colleague if he desires it.

Mr. NICHOLLS. My colleague is at this time considering the subject of overtrading and overproduction. Let me ask him whether it is not true that every man should be allowed to manufacture his corn and his fruit into anything he may wish without being compelled to pay a tax upon it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, that may be all true, Mr. Chairman; I am now merely addressing myself in answer to the appeals for sympathy which have been put forward in behalf of the passage of this bill, and showing that this is not at all an exception to the general rule. It is the same old story we have had in almost every age and in almost every country, that money will take wings and fly away. Sir, I once heard a distinguished statesman say that most men failed in life; and when I witness the misfortunes of the gentlemen who have invested their capital in this enterprise I extend to them sympathy, as I do to every person in distress in every place and in every calling. But I propose to discuss this bill as a matter of principle and public policy.

Gentlemen say that the Government does not need this tax. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Government does not need this tax for public purposes it is not right to collect it. Your tariff is too high and should be reduced. You have no right to continue it and to lend the money to anybody. You collect twenty-odd million of dollars from the poor men who are toiling on their farms raising tobacco, and you propose to continue that tax from which you collect a sum only one-third of what it is proposed you shall now lend to men engaged in the manufacture of liquor. You continue to collect that tax when you do not need it and lend it to somebody else who is in distress.

Mr. CLAY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLOUNT. I prefer not.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope my colleague will not insist on interrupting the gentleman from Georgia, whose statement I consider to be a very unfair one.

Mr. BLOUNT. So far as the criticism of the gentleman from Kentucky is concerned, I will say that I am presenting my views on this question without reference to any person.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the gentleman should be fair enough to state to the House that the tax on tobacco is not collected until it goes into consumption.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will not be in too much haste and allow me to proceed with my argument in my own way I will state at the proper time exactly how that tax is collected.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I suggest to my colleague to call attention also to the fact that the cotton tax of $3 per bale was collected before it left the gin-house, and before it was sold and entered into consumption.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is said, Mr. Chairman, that the distillers of whisky have paid enormous sums which have gone toward the prosecution of the war and in payment of pensioners of the Government, and therefore they are persons who are entitled to some consideration. Yes; that tax has been paid, but it is a well-known fact, admitted by every one, that it is a tax paid by the people who consume the article and not by those who manufacture it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, himself admitted this fact in his argument yesterday. I presume there is no gentleman here who will controvert it.

The advantage of this provision of allowing liquors to go into bonded warehouses for three years has had its most happy result to the large distillers. The great body of the smaller distilleries have disappeared, or rather there has been a great restraint upon the part of small manufacturers, men with small capital, and the business has necessarily drifted into the very hands of the people who are now here asking for this relief—the men of capital.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] asked the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] if the distillers themselves desired the continuation of this tax. Mr. Chairman, I think it quite evident, after what I have stated as to the restraints upon the small distillers and the large additions to the distillation on the part of the large distillers and in connection with the vast sums of money they have invested in the business, that if these things are to be regarded at all, if men are to be considered as standing by their own interests in business matters, I think there can be no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that they do not want the tax repealed. I was not surprised when the gentleman from Kentucky stated that this bill was a question between the men who wanted to restrain the manufacture of liquor and those who wanted to give unlimited distillation. It is an easy thing for the gentleman from Kentucky to range himself on the side of virtue in this proposition, claiming it will result in restraining distillation. Seven-tenths of the whisky now owned by the men who are now knocking at the doors of this Congress for relief is bourbon whisky; 53,000,000 gallons of that whisky comes from the Kentucky districts——

Mr. WILLIS. Does not the gentleman from Georgia know that not one-tenth of that whisky is owned in Kentucky?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not know it.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, ought to know that fact.

Mr. RANDALL. Who does own it?

Mr. BLOUNT. I say, sir, there is here presented a proposition to give an extension on 70,000,000 gallons, and 52,000,000 of that product is in Kentucky, while forty-five millions of the sixty-three millions to be loaned goes to the extension of time on whisky in Kentucky warehouses. And this being true, it does not befit the gentleman from Kentucky to take the position he has taken here. I say, Mr. Chairman, with this vast amount of whisky in the State of Kentucky, it does not befit the gentleman under such circumstances to declare that those who are disagreeing to this bonded extension are in favor of the unlimited distillation of liquor. Even by the gentleman's own statement more whisky is now in the country than can be consumed in four years, even under his virtuous process. They are four years ahead in the matter of manufacture.

Mr. WILLIS. No, only two years.

Mr. BLOUNT. Two years ahead in their manufacture, the gentleman corrects me.

Now, if this is true, the gentleman is mistaken in his temperance movement. There were only 19,000,000 gallons in the bonded warehouses when that act went into operation, when this legislation was adopted, and when they were not required to pay interest upon their capital, the act which allowed liquor to remain in bond for three years. It stimulated production. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue so states, and the gentleman from Kentucky himself must admit. Therefore, on the ground of the temperance interest, the gentleman had better change his position.

I stated a few moments ago that I regarded this in the light of a proposition to lend to these gentlemen the sum of $66,000,000 for two years. I do not believe that this measure, which they are pleased to call one of public policy, is going to remedy the evil of which they complain. In 1879 they made 71,000,000 gallons; in 1880, 90,000,000 gallons; in 1881, 117,000,000 gallons; in 1882, 105,000,000 gallons; and in 1883, 74,000,000 gallons—more than the country required. And yet they were at the last Congress asking for relief, although they were making that same year more than the country could consume. Sir, the extension in my judgment will not accomplish any good results. The effect will be to aggravate the evil.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen complain that whisky has been treated badly, in legislation exceptionally so; that it stands on a worse footing than beer, on a worse footing than tobacco, on a worse footing than the importers of foreign goods. I think I can show to this House with their patient attention that whisky has, in the legislation of this country, been granted a privilege over every one of these products.

Now, sir, let us look first at tobacco. They tell you the tax on tobacco is paid when it is put upon the market. Very well; that is undisputed. But let us have some more facts about it. Let us see the situation. Most of the tobacco is under contract and sold before it is manufactured. In less than three months the whole crop is manufactured and sold. I state this as a general proposition and gentlemen from the tobacco districts will doubtless verify my statement, and if they do not the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that annually there is paid into the Treasury the tax on the manufactured tobacco. The gentleman from Virginia behind me [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] declares it to be a fact. Then, Mr. Chairman, what indulgence is there to the manufacturer? Every year his tax is paid just as soon as the Government has occasion to use it. Where then, practically, is the privilege extended to the manufacturer of tobacco?

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] declared that the beer tax is paid when the article is put upon the market. Why, Mr. Chairman, what I have said as to the manufacturers of tobacco is true as to the manufacturers of beer. The tax is paid on the product within less than twelve months.

Mr. CLAY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the gentleman if the tax on manufactured tobacco and the tax on beer is not paid when the article enters into consumption and not until then? If that be a fact and whisky pays a tax before it enters into consumption, is not whisky the only article that is required to pay the tax before going into consumption?

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I am dealing not with technicalities but with facts. I am dealing with facts which people have to battle with. I am dealing with facts which legislators should not conceal from their own eyes. And I say, as a matter of fact, there goes into the coffers of the Government all the tax to which manufacturers on tobacco are liable within six months after manufacture. I say, as a matter of fact, there goes into the coffers of the Federal Government within six months, or at least within twelve months, all the tax within any one year to which beer is liable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see about customs. Gentlemen complain that they are not put upon an equal footing with the importers of foreign goods. Now bear in mind the fact that they have these $70,000,000, and that they have had it or will have it for three years without interest. And then let us look at the facts in connection with your customs. The duties on customs amount to from $230,000,000 to $240,000,000. I do not undertake to be precisely accurate. How much is there in the Federal warehouses? On January 1, 1883, of that immense sum, forty-three millions. And you find right away a withdrawal during the month of $10,000,000.

Going along down, you find the amount reduced to twenty-two millions, and then again gradually rising until on September 1, 1883, it has reached thirty-five millions. You will find, sir, that there is all the while going on a withdrawal while the goods are in the warehouse. They do not remain there. They are constantly being withdrawn. But even if they did, there is no period in which gentlemen can show there is one-sixth of the tax due on foreign goods withheld by reason of the permit to remain in the bonded warehouse. The great bulk of them is immediately withdrawn or withdrawn in a very short period.

I have before me from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics a compilation in which we find the following:

Imported merchandise remaining in warehouses July 31, August 31, and September 30, 1883.

The value in dollars, July 31, was forty millions; on August 31 it had changed to thirty-five millions; in September, to thirty millions. And if you will examine the articles included in it, you will find the largest sums to be in fruits, clothing, and iron.

I submit to the good sense of this House that when gentlemen say that the importer of foreign goods at the expiration of three years has the privilege of re-exporting and getting an additional six years, I submit whether or not it would not be the wildest folly for any man to import goods and do business on the idea of allowing his iron, his fruits, or his cotton and woolen goods to lie six years while fruits were decaying and the styles in goods were changing. It is absurd to suppose any such thing. The business of this country is not done in that way.

I desire to call attention to the following statement of the laws in relation to customs:

Act August 30, 1842, section 12 (5 Statutes, 561): Duties to be paid in cash. On failure to pay goods to be placed in public stores and sold after sixty days by Government.

Act August 6, 1846, section 1 (9 Statutes, 53), amends former act of 1842 by allowing goods to be entered and placed in bonded warehouses. If remaining beyond one year in warehouse without payment of duties to be sold by Government.

Act March 3, 1849, section 5 (9 Statutes, 399), modifies former law by allowing goods to remain in warehouse an additional year for withdrawal for exportation (i. e., two years from date of importation).

Act March 28, 1854, section 4 (10 Statutes, 270), allows goods to remain in warehouse three years either for consumption or exportation.

Act March 14, 1866, sections 1 and 2 (14 Statutes, 8), allows goods in bond to remain in warehouse three years for consumption or exportation, but if withdrawn for consumption after one year from date of importation they shall pay an additional duty of 10 per cent. on the duties originally assessed.

This last is reproduced in sections 2970 and 2971, Revised Statutes, and is the present law.

Act August 5, 1861, section 5 (12 Statutes, 293), provides that goods must be withdrawn from warehouse within three months for consumption and within three years for exportation, with proviso that they may be withdrawn for consumption after three months and before expiration of two years on payment of duties and 25 per cent. thereof additional.

Act July 14, 1862, section 21 (12 Statutes, 559), provides that goods must be withdrawn for consumption within one year and within three years for exportation.

When the provision in reference to exportation was inserted in that legislation for what purpose was it done? In 1846, when there was the beginning of a liberal policy toward the importers, it was urged upon Congress that American merchants should have the privilege of bringing in foreign goods not for sale in American markets but with the view of making up mixed cargoes for exportation. It was alleged as a reason for and as an illustration of that policy that at that very time there was at Liverpool over two hundred millions in value of foreign goods brought in not for consumption but for re-exportation, brought in with a view to making up cargoes for re-exportation. It was not in the interest of any one in distress, but in the interest of a great public policy. As I understand it, the gentleman's proposition is not in the interest of any public policy except that general one, that general welfare which covers everything and which will relieve them from present distress. The gentleman, therefore, on the matter of exportation can furnish no reason to this House.

I have stated the principle upon which it was done as to foreign goods. Now, it is not the purpose of these gentlemen to export this whisky; they declare that they ask this relief because it is a case of pecuniary distress to themselves in the present emergency.

But let us look further. Goods imported may remain in the bonded warehouse without paying any charge for one year. Then they may remain two years more by the payment of 10 per cent. on the value of the goods. If the goods remain there twenty-four hours over the twelve months, this 10 per cent. must be paid. But in this case those interested in this legislation have already had or will have their liquors in bonded warehouses for three years without the payment of a nickel in the way of interest. Does the importer have any advantage in that respect? Let me read from the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who seems to think that these gentlemen have had a very especial advantage:

The causes which, in addition to the improvement of the times, have led to this great increase in the production of distilled spirits are the amendments of the internal-revenue laws, which have secured—

Have secured what?

First, the increase in the bonded period from one year to three years.

That is identical with the privilege accorded to the importer in bringing in foreign goods.

Second, the allowance for loss by leakage while in the warehouse.

This is an advantage which the distiller has over the importer.

Third, the relief from the payment of interest on tax while in bonded warehouse.

For two years out of the three which the importer can leave his goods in the bonded warehouse he must pay 10 per cent. of the value of the duty on the goods. The distiller of whisky is not required under the present law to pay one nickel of interest, as I have said, while his goods remain in the bonded warehouse.

Fourth. The allowance of leakage of spirits while in transportation for export or to manufacturers' warehouse.

I say that these are peculiar advantages to the distiller, when compared with the privileges allowed to the importer of foreign goods. Then as a matter of fact where is the peculiar hardship on the distiller? If at the end of three years the importer shall not pay his tax his goods are confiscated by the Government and sold.

It is said that the importer has the privilege of exportation. What does that amount to? For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the value of imported goods amounted to $716,000,000 and the amount re-exported was only $17,000,000, and that proportion is pretty generally preserved. When an importer brings his goods into this country and finds there is a bad market here for them, in all probability the same will be the case in other parts of the world, and he must accept his misfortune and bear his loss.

Therefore it seems to me that the allegation here made that the legislation of this country has been hostile toward this people will not bear examination. They have an advantage over the manufacturers of tobacco in fact; perhaps, though, not in the mere terms of the law. In fact, the distiller of whisky has an advantage over the producer of beer, for the beer manufacturer wants no indulgence and the amount of his tax goes at once into the Treasury. It is true the form of the statute may give it to him, but the fact remains that he is not asking for indulgence.

These distillers have had an advantage up to this time in that they have had their whisky in bond for three years without paying interest on the tax. They have an advantage in that the great bulk of the whisky in the country has been held in bond and the Government has been kept out of the tax on it. They are not entitled to the privilege of exportation, because, as I have said, that privilege was intended as a great commercial policy.

This bill is not asking for the indefinite extension of the bonded period. It is not placed upon the great, broad, economic principle that the tax shall be paid when the goods are withdrawn from bond and put upon the market. It is urged here that there is an overproduction, that these parties who have had three years' time are now in distress, that they owe $66,000,000 or will do so in a short time, and if they are forced to pay it financial distress and embarrassment will be produced; they therefore want to be allowed two years more; that the Government shall loan them this $66,000,000 for two years more at 4½ per cent.

Who loans the poor toiling man in the tobacco-field in his time of distress money at 4½ per cent.? And why should he be compelled to pay taxes to the Government in order that the money may be used in this way? Why should there be taken from his hard earnings money to be used for any such purpose as this?

But the great difficulty lies in another direction. The owners of this whisky are threatening to export it. At one time we are told that they can not export it, because the banks will not allow them to do so. At another time it is noised all about us that they will export it, and the Government will lose the tax. I know that generally they have the power to export it and that the Government can not get the tax if they see fit to avoid it by exportation. They are protected by the Constitution of the United States in that.

But I know further that there is a growing disposition to repeal all the internal taxes. While I do not concur in that entirely, yet I understand that the time is not far distant when we will be in a condition to repeal those taxes, and leading men all over the country are now advocating it. In 1887 the last of these taxes on distilled spirits will become due. We will then be liable to the same condition of things and will have the same cry here.

We have no guarantee from the form of this bill that the demand will not be again repeated. Capital is ever ready to help itself by aid of legislation if it can get it. In the mean time the amount of this tax may perhaps reach from one hundred to two hundred millions of dollars. If it shall be the case that the internal taxes are abolished, you will then be asked to grant a rebate of this tax then due.

It will be said, "You have turned loose everybody else to engage in the business of distillation; you have allowed everybody else to manufacture whisky, and this tax is absolutely confiscation to us." The argument will come in a form that will address itself to the sense of justice of everybody, and you will be compelled to regard it. With what propriety can we allow this fund to be realized and accumulated, and then in the course of a few years cancel the obligation of these bonds? For one, sir, I can not consent to any such measure. Able newspaper writers, persuasive orators, may carry the mind of this House away from the simple truths that should govern our conduct on this occasion; but the people will calmly and soberly consider the facts, and will indignantly condemn our action if we should adopt this measure.

I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague [Mr. REESE].

Mr. REESE addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. COX, of New York, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution providing for the printing of 6,000 extra copies of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate upon the necessity for such legislation as shall protect our interests against those governments which have prohibited or restricted the importation of meats from the United States. Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 1027) for the relief of James H. Woodard; and

A bill (S. 1407) to authorize the issuing of a register to John S. McQuinn and J. Warren Wonson for the schooner Druid.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announcing that he had, March 20, 1884, approved and signed a bill (H. R. 1292) for the relief of Louisa Boddy.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Mr. Chairman, here is a large interest in my district which is deeply concerned in the passage of this bill, and I am glad to have the opportunity of saying a few words in its favor. I have listened to the arguments on the other side, particularly to the speech of the gentleman from Georgia, and I fail to see that the passage of this bill will contravene any system of public policy or be in any manner injurious to any of the interests of this country.

I have heard the objection of the gentleman that the persons now interested and anxious for the passage of this bill received timely warning from the Secretary of the Treasury and from other public men that they were manufacturing too much of the article and that there would be a surplus of production. The argument to be derived from that statement is that these men acted unwisely, and because these gentlemen acted unwisely, because they failed to obey the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury or other wise statesmen who made the suggestions, that therefore they are not entitled to relief. That is all there is of it. For my own part, sir, I am compelled to say that I see no force whatever in that argument.

The gentleman seems to admit that the Government has no need for the money which will be derived from the payment of the tax upon this surplus production of spirits.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. There is so much confusion in the Hall that it is impossible to hear the speaker who is now addressing the committee, and I am surprised that he can hear himself. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I shall be very brief in my remarks. The gentleman seemed to admit, as I have stated, that the Government has no need for the money which will arise from the payment of the tax upon this surplus production, and he says emphatically that if the Government has no need for it it has no right to collect it. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will vote for a proposition, if it shall be introduced in this House to-day, to abolish the tax upon this surplus production of spirits and let it come free from the bonded warehouses? Is that what the gentleman means?

If he says we have no right to collect the tax, then he should be in favor of passing a law to prevent its collection. But we know that the tax is existing upon this commodity. We know that in three years from the time it is deposited in the bonded warehouses it must be removed and the tax paid, and that it can not be removed until the tax is paid.

Now, what is the condition of affairs? We have, it is stated, a surplus of $140,000,000 in the Treasury. That much money is withdrawn from the circulation of the country. That amount fails to enter into the business of the country. It is an amount which is bearing no interest and yielding no good to the Government or to anybody else. Independent of this amount of one hundred and forty millions of surplus revenue it is proposed to force upon the market, not 70,000,000 of gallons, as the gentleman says, but 45,000,000 of gallons, according to the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon which the tax is to be paid. In other words, it is proposed to add to this surplus of one hundred and forty millions which is derived from other sources of revenue as well as distilled spirits, and which is in part the revenue derived from distilled spirits already consumed or in process of consumption, the revenue which would be derived from the 45,000,000 of gallons of spirits, which would amount to something over $40,000,000. It is proposed, I say, to add this amount to the already existing surplus. This amount, for it is evidently a business matter, is in the Treasury now and bears no interest. It is, as I have said, yielding nothing to any one; and yet it is proposed to add to this already great surplus the revenue to be derived from 45,000,000 of gallons of spirits which are to be forced upon the market in excess of the demands of the country.

I submit to the gentleman if this proposition in any aspect in which you may view it is a wise financial policy to pursue by any statesman who looks to the interest of the country. Let me ask, why should this vast amount of money be drawn from the business of the country simply to be placed in the vaults of the Treasury and yielding nothing to any one? Why increase the surplus in the Government vaults by withdrawing from the business interests of the country the amount derived from the tax on distilled spirits? I say simply as a question of financial policy there is no reason in it, there is no wisdom in it.

But as a question of justice. The gentleman says that this is class legislation. Prior to 1868, we have been told, the tax was not collectible on distilled spirits until they were actually removed from the bonded warehouse. In other words, it was purely upon the consumption that the tax was levied, and the distiller was not bound to pay the tax until he was ready to sell the commodity for purposes of consumption. But that law, as you are all aware, has been changed; and now he has only three years, which is the limit within which the spirits may remain in the bonded warehouse free of tax, instead of the advantage previously granted him under the old law. This is a peculiar restriction upon his business, for prior to the date I have mentioned he was not required to pay the tax until the spirits went into consumption; but now he is required to do so at the expiration of the period named.

There is another point into the discussion of which I need not enter because it was so fully elucidated by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means—that this legislation is an exceptional legislation; that it applies to the liquor interest and that alone; that it does not apply to any other article on which internal-revenue taxes are collected; that it is class legislation. If this is class legislation, the whole legislation in regard to the whisky interest is class legislation. And do we do more than was done in 1878 by extending the period two years instead of three from the time the whisky is required to be taken out of the bonded warehouse? Nothing more. Class legislation is just the other way, as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] suggests to me. The persons engaged in this traffic we must look upon as entitled to the same rights, as entitled to the same consideration, as having a right to be governed by the same laws as any other citizens in the community. Whatever we may think about the traffic, it is a legitimate traffic; and no statesman has the right to distinguish, nor is it wise he should distinguish, between those engaged in that traffic and those engaged in any other traffic. We are not here as moralists to determine whether abstractly it is right to sell spirits and be engaged in the traffic. Not at all. Those engaged in the traffic are entitled to the same privileges as any other citizen. And I say here and now if there were any other interest subject to the payment of taxes in the United States which occupied the same position as the whisky interest does to-day I would be in favor of giving it that relief and protection from an impending calamity which this bill proposes.

That is all there is in it; and it is a protection which injures no one, which does not take money out of one man's pocket to put into the pocket of another man. It is a protection which does not injure the Government. It is strictly in accordance with law. And if we look upon these men and treat them as entitled to the same consideration as any other citizens in the community, then it is a protection which they are entitled to as well as any others.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue tells us there are forty-five millions of gallons which will have to be taken out of the bonded warehouses. And that is to be thrown upon the market in addition to the production by the distilleries already in existence. It is unnecessary for me to say the effect of this will be to reduce the price of the article and to create distress, falling on those who have it on hand and those who have advanced money upon it. Then so far as they are concerned it is simply a question of justice and fairness and right. I can not conceive how any man, unless he has something against these distillers which I have not heard, unless he has some other argument which addresses itself to considerations of public policy which I have not heard, can claim that this bill should not pass.

The Government has it in its power to crush these men. They say so. The argument derived from the facts reported to us by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue proves that fact. And it is simply a question as to whether the Government, having it in its power to destroy this interest or to preserve it, will by simply withholding its hand, by doing that which injures no one, by doing that which contravenes no question of public policy—whether it will preserve or whether it will destroy. That is the question. It is a question of fairness and of justice, and so far as it can be looked at in a financial point of view a question of wisdom. I am aware that there is a spirit abroad in this land, not in this House, but there is a spirit abroad in this land which, because it may dislike a particular individual or class of individuals or abhor a practice in which they are engaged, however legitimate that may be under the Constitution and the laws, would for that reason, and that reason alone, crush them out of existence. I trust that there is no such spirit here. I trust that we will approach this question in a spirit of fairness and justice, and I am confident if that is the case this bill will be passed and these men will be relieved, because it is simply a question of relief.

I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. What time does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD] have to yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-four minutes.

Mr. BELFORD. Ten minutes will be enough for me.

I desire to say, and I think every gentleman will avouch the correctness of my statement, that during the years I have been in this House I have never engaged in filibustering on any question, whether the Democrats had the majority or the Republicans. I voted for the consideration of this bill because I regard it as a bill of vital importance, and I was justified in voting for it on account of the reasons which I desire the opportunity to state.

My Democratic friends, and especially my sweet friend from New York who has made a partisan speech on the tariff, have proceeded on the principle of playing one way to-day and another way to-morrow. They cut down the appropriations on the naval bill $8,000,000. They cut down the appropriations on the next bill $4,000,000. And all this economy has come from the State of Pennsylvania and the State of New York. And I desire the country to know in the coming Presidential campaign that the Democratic party has been cheese-paring and peanutting on this question of finances. And now we are asked to put into the Treasury seventy million additional dollars in order that it may be kept there and in order that it may be kept out of the hands of the laboring people of this country. And if you can not summon a number of members sufficient to pass this bill I want the country to know that you lacked courage to do it. I for one, standing on this side of the Chamber, announce my purpose to vote for the bill, and I announce it upon these grounds:

First, the great banks of this country have invested millions of dollars in this whisky business, and if we drive this whisky out of the bonded warehouses we are going to have a panic. Any man who has sense enough to pound glass into a rat-hole ought to comprehend that proposition. That is reason number one.

I know that this whisky business is unpopular. But temperance, while I respect it, was defined by the old Roman to be in medio via tutissimus ibis—the middle way is the safe way. Temperance does not mean prohibition; it does not mean crankism. If you are going to adopt a temperance law in this House let me suggest one to you. It is to provide that any man who sells you adulterated wine or adulterated liquor should be sent to the penitentiary for life. [Laughter.] People have drunk liquor from the time of Noah, and they will drink it until the coming of the millennium. Christ himself manufactured wine, and what He could do we ought not to be ashamed of.

I say that in the great and vital conflict of this Republic, when we were struggling for the salvation of this nation, the men owning liquors paid over $100,000,000 of taxation year after year to the Government. I asked my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] whether he had a tabulated statement showing the amount that had been paid by this interest in the form of taxes to the Government. I say to you that if you will go to the Treasury Department and ask there how much this interest contributed to the support of our arms and to the salvation of our Republic you will find that what I have said is absolutely true.

But independent of that, let me tell you why we should pass this bill. I will reiterate it, as Cato did in the Roman senate. [Laughter.] Do not laugh yet; you will think differently when I get through. I will reiterate it as Cato did in the Roman senate when he said that Carthage should be destroyed. I will vote for this bill in order to keep $70,000,000 out of the Treasury, idle and unemployed, and in my judgment to be used for the purpose of producing distress and poverty among the people of this country. I am for the people, and against capitalists and monopolists. I do not care whether I float on one wave or another, so that I can aid them in securing bread and butter.

I do not propose that this administration, with the support of the Republican party or the support of the Democratic party, shall hoard up in vaults and keep idle and unused millions on millions of dollars, the amount constantly increasing, while that which belongs to the people is constantly diminishing and their means of earning an honest living is being impaired.

I care nothing about the opprobrium that may be attached to this bill. I am in favor of reducing the tax on whisky and tobacco because I am a high-tariff protectionist. I know that if we do not do so we will have to repeal the tariff. Standing upon the tariff, I am in favor of this bill or any other that will protect and benefit the great industries of the people of this country.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BELFORD. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. Is the gentleman in favor of relieving altogether the distillers of the tax on the whisky now in bond?

Mr. BELFORD. No; I am in favor of keeping that amount of tax out of the Treasury for the present.

Mr. BRUMM. If the gentleman is not in favor of that, then I ask him if this bill will not actually pay more money into the Treasury by requiring 4½ per cent. interest for two years upon the amount of the tax?

Mr. BELFORD. No; not at all. If I have two years in which to pay a note I do not see how the bank is going to get any money out of me before I pay it.

Mr. BRUMM. But you impose by this bill an additional tax of 4½ per cent. for the two years.

Mr. BELFORD. You must recognize one fact, and you can not escape it: We have now $150,000,000 of surplus revenue in the Treasury that is absolutely idle, and you propose if you do not pass this bill to add $70,000,000 more to it.

A MEMBER. Not that much.

Mr. BELFORD. I asked the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON] whether the amount of tax on the whisky now in bond would not amount to $70,000,000, and he said it was certainly $50,000,000, and probably more. You Greenbackers ought never to vote against a bill that will keep that amount of surplus revenue out of the Treasury when you know from absolutely ascertained facts that it will be kept there idle all the time.

I am fighting for this bill on principle. I want to see that Treasury unload itself. I do not want to collect from the people taxes on whisky and tobacco if they are to be kept in the Treasury. Let them pay the debt that this nation owes. There are $260,000,000 of callable outstanding debt. Why does not the Secretary of the Treasury call in those bonds and pay them? Who can answer that question?

I care nothing about the fact that he is a Republican. I want his defenders on the floor of this House to tell me and to tell you why he keeps that money there and pays 3 per cent. on these bonds, when he has $150,000,000 with which to pay them and the effort is being made to put $70,000,000 more into the Treasury, so that it can be hoarded in the vaults of that great building. If that is republicanism I wash my hands of it.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, in discussing this bill I shall endeavor to be perfectly fair toward the interest which is seeking relief here at the hands of Congress. I shall treat those who are engaged in the production of whisky just exactly as I would treat the producers of any other manufactured article.

I oppose this bill not on temperance grounds, for I think that question has fairly nothing to do with the subject. I oppose it because in my opinion it has heretofore had all the special legislation it is entitled to. It has been before us time and again. It has had relief time and again, and I now feel morally certain that if we grant the relief this time we will be called upon hereafter to grant the same or some other and further relief.

In other words, I believe that if we shall pass this bill we will demonstrate that the Congress of the United States is unable to resist any demands that the whisky interest may press pertinaciously and unitedly upon us. I want this Congress to meet the question, and I want to be able to defeat this bill by a square vote, so that those who are interested in the manufacture of whisky and those who deal in and buy that article shall at last understand that the time has come when they, just as all other people of this country, must abide by the law, and that they can expect no further special legislation for their benefit. I think it is high time we should teach them that lesson.

Notwithstanding I feel thus, if I believed there was danger of a panic such as the advocates of the measure represent would follow the failure to pass this bill, if I believed that some great financial calamity would follow the defeat of the measure, I would vote for it. But, Mr. Chairman, whenever that interest has come before this Congress demanding relief, it has come just as it does now, telling us it was absolutely essential that special relief to it should be granted unless we were willing that some great calamity should overtake the country.

There are gentlemen around me now, members of the Forty-seventh Congress, who heard, and I venture to say that no one who heard it has forgotten, the eloquent, impassioned appeal made on this floor in behalf of a similar measure about one year ago by the distinguished statesman who is now at the head of the great Commonwealth of Kentucky. The present governor of that State, Hon. J. Proctor Knott, appealed to us at that time most feelingly to take up the bill, then pending, extending the time for the payment of taxes on whisky. He predicted, as did everybody else who was here urging the bill, that if relief was not granted a panic was just upon us. It floated through these corridors, it was heard on this floor——

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman will allow me to say that immediately after the failure of that measure half a dozen of the most prominent firms in my own city went into bankruptcy. Similar failures occurred in Cincinnati and in New York, one of the establishments being the great firm of Ives, Beecher & Co.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman has only confirmed my position. The fulfillment of Mr. Knott's prediction, as this eloquent gentleman [Mr. WILLIS] now states when he rises to interrupt me, was the failure among the 50,000,000 of people in this country of only half a dozen firms he can specify.

Mr. WILLIS. I said that in my city there were half a dozen.

Mr. HERBERT. The prediction of Mr. Knott was that we were to have a panic; that the interests of the whisky manufacturers and the whisky owners were so intimately connected with the interests of everybody else, with all the business interests of the country, that a general financial panic would result at once from a failure to relieve them. But twelve months have passed, the whisky tax falling due in that time has been paid, and we have no panic yet.

Let us go back a little and look into the history of legislation on this subject, that we may gather some lessons from the laws which have been passed and the reasons which induced them.

Up to 1868 whisky paid taxes only when it was entered for consumption, and it is contended that this was the only proper plan. Under that plan there occurred at Chicago and Saint Louis and in other portions of the country those frauds which caused the cheek of every true patriot and lover of republican government to turn pale with apprehension for the future of the Government. The result was a change in the law. By the act of 1868 whisky was compelled to pay taxes within one year after it was produced. So the law remained until 1878, when, on the 28th of March, an act was passed at the behest of persons in this interest extending the period for the payment of taxes on whisky in bond to three years. That law was not only prospective, applying to whisky thereafter produced, but it was retroactive, applying to all whisky which had been produced within the previous year, and upon the whisky produced within the previous year a tax of 5 per cent. per annum was assessed. Afterward this interest tax was, in the interest of the whisky men, repealed, if I understand the matter correctly.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] said to-day that most of or all of that interest tax had been paid before the repeal of the law. In this I think he must have been mistaken. If the tax had been paid, what was the reason for the repeal of the law?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think my friend from Alabama does not understand exactly the provision of that law.

Mr. HERBERT. I will yield for a correction.

Mr. THOMPSON. The law of 1878, which increased the bonded period from one to three years on whisky in bond at that time as well as on the future product, required 5 per cent. interest to be paid on the deferred tax. During the year 1878 the total amount collected as interest under this 5 per cent. provision was something over $74,000—nearly $75,000. The estimate was that it would produce after that time about $150,000 a year. But in 1880, when Congress undertook in a large measure to remodel the revenue system by what is known as the "Carlisle bill," removing the 10-cent stamp tax, the exporters' tax, and sundry other minor taxes which produced but little revenue and were annoying both to the Department and to the distillers, the 5 per cent. interest clause was repealed, because the amount of revenue produced by it was too insignificant to justify its continuance.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman has simply gone into details and cited the exact law which verifies my statement. I said that law was repealed while some taxes were still due under it. He says it was repealed in 1880. The law gave three years on all whisky made within one year before the 28th of March, 1878. There must then, as a matter of course, have been some whisky on which the interest tax was due at the time of the repeal of this act in 1880.

Mr. THOMPSON rose.

Mr. HERBERT. I am sure I am correct, and I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me.

I wish to show what results followed the passage of the law of 1878.

I maintain that the consequence of granting the relief asked for in this bill will be to encourage overproduction of whisky in the future. That is exactly what the passage of such acts in the past have resulted in; this I can demonstrate beyond any doubt. Here I hold the testimony offered in behalf of this bill before the Ways and Means Committee. On page 3 of that printed testimony it appears that in April, 1879, shortly after the extension of the bonded period, the amount of whisky produced in the United States was 250,585 gallons. That amount continued to increase. It went gradually along until in three years after the passage of that act the production had run up from 250,000 gallons in April, 1879, until it reached, in January, 1881, 3,724,776 gallons, and in February 4,028,774 gallons, and in March to 4,991,913. That is the gradual increase which followed the granting of the relief in 1878, and that relief was asked for, like this, because it was said to be necessary because it was believed to be absolutely essential to prevent great financial distress.

Then, in the fall of 1882, when the Forty-seventh Congress began, this House was flooded with bills asking a similar but further relief, asking absolute, indefinite extension; in other words, that distillers might keep whisky in bond till they got ready to put it on the market and pay taxes. Those bills went to the Ways and Means Committee of that Congress. A bill granting indefinite extension was reported back to this House, and under suspension of the rules, on the 3d day of April, 1882, it was passed.

What were the reasons given at that time? In the report it is said:

> Besides, the information received by the committee conduces to show that there is at this time an urgent necessity for the extension of the time during which spirits may remain in bond, as a measure of relief to distillers and dealers who have large stocks on hand.

Further on the report says:

> Unless the time shall be extended, the tax of 90 cents per gallon must be paid to the Government on these spirits whether there is a sale of the article or not, and there are reasonable grounds to believe that in many cases the immediate exaction of such large amounts of money from the owners of unsold goods would result in their financial ruin, while in all cases it would be a very great hardship.

Below I have marked another paragraph in a letter sent to the committee and published with this report where Mr. Green B. Raum, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, predicted that great financial distress would follow the failure to pass that bill just as we have the same thing predicted on this floor to-day. He said:

> It seems to me unreasonable to suppose that these spirits can all be removed for consumption within the time now required by law. If the manufacturers and owners are required to pay the taxes within three years, I would expect to see such a decline in prices as would seriously embarrass many strong firms, probably cause many failures, and unfavorably affect other branches of business without any beneficial results to the Government.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HERBERT. I will for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. WILLIS. I only desire to ask the gentleman if he knows in reference to this threat of bankruptcy—whether he, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, knows that for the year ending the 31st of December, 1882, there was only a million and a half due, and that for the year ending December 31, 1883, there were only fifteen millions due, and that for the present year there were thirty-eight millions? We saw the storm coming, and endeavored to get Congress then to provide against that storm.

Mr. HERBERT. Let me answer the gentleman. He says we saw, that is the distillers whom he represents at that time saw, the storm coming, and demanded the bill then pending. In January, February, and March while the bill was before the committee, and in April, 1882, when the bill passed, he says they saw the storm coming.

Mr. WILLIS. Does not the gentleman know this whisky was then produced and in bond? They knew it was there and would come out month after month as the three years expired.

Mr. HERBERT. I have given the production of whisky at that precise time, and the point I make is that while the distillers were asking for relief, that at the very time they came before the Committee on Ways and Means with their application, and exactly when they caused this report to be made, they were adding to the overproduction. The table presented to the present Committee of Ways and Means, showing the amounts of whisky produced for the months of January, February, March, and April, shows that the distillers were then gradually but rapidly increasing the amount of their production. Here it is: In December, 1881, they produced 5,230,083 gallons; in January, 1882, 5,046,892 gallons; and in February, 1882, 5,317,673 gallons. The gentleman says they saw the storm coming.

If the storm has come, they invited it. If they are in peril, if they are embarrassed, as some of them I know are, they are responsible, just as other business men in this country are responsible for their situation.

Now, that bill passed through this House. It went to the Senate and there it was delayed a long time. In the next session it was taken up, and when that bill was finally brought back to the House it was defeated, because the House, having learned more about it from the discussions in the Senate, refused to give it consideration. It was never taken from the Speaker's table. Then it was, and not until then, that the production of whisky began to fall off. Just so long as it seemed to the producers of this article that Congress would grant them whatever measure of relief they asked, just so long did they continue to manufacture it. They never stopped their production until they began to see that they could not command Congress at will. Then production began to fall off. Now they come again with the same appeal. They ask you to extend this relief. Why do they want it?

Why the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] himself, in arguing this question, has indicated that the distillers wish to start again such distilleries as have closed. His argument is that a great deal of corn will thereby find a market. How? By beginning operations again in distilleries that are now idle. But why do this if there is already enough whisky on hand to answer the purposes of consumption, as they say, for two years? That is a plain business question. The whisky producers themselves admit, by their own arguments here when they say that the passage of this bill will furnish a market for corn, that now, when whisky is, as they themselves complain, a drug on the market, they will again begin operations if they get this act passed and add to that surplus already on the market.

I think, sir, that I have demonstrated my first proposition, but I ought to read some figures in order to do so. I hold in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on this subject. I asked him to give me the amount of whisky—bourbon and rye—produced in the last few years, and before I get through I will show you that this is the especial interest here claiming relief. I asked him to give me the figures showing the amounts produced of these two classes of whisky. The amount gradually runs down, as this table shows, from about 43,000,000 entered into bond during the year 1882 to 3,038,000 for the first half of the present fiscal year; and the whole amount of whiskies of that class in bond on the 1st day of January, 1884, is simply 64,000,000 gallons.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is danger of any great financial disturbance to follow from the refusal to pass this bill. We may possibly be on the eve of a period of great commercial distress. But if it is to come it will not be the result of failing to give the whisky interest all the legislation it wants. I know, sir, that gentlemen who draw these dark pictures are very honest in their opinions. I know nearly every one of them; they are my personal friends. But I am satisfied that in their minds they aggravate the situation. How easy is it to do that. Telegrams came to them here day after day; newspapers, filled with articles drawing dark pictures of distress, come to them day after day; letters making urgent appeals come to them by every mail, and as a matter of course they feel deeply upon the subject. They are filled with the zeal of the advocate who pleads the cause of a client. It is an easy matter for a great interest like the whisky people to get into a panic. I feel perfectly certain that they themselves in their own minds exaggerate the situation.

If we would see the actual extent of the interest really involved here let us separate bourbon and rye whiskies and the other class known as high wines and cheap whiskies. The latter class, as everybody knows, does not require to be in bond to mature. Whiskies of that class are produced from time to time according to the demands of the market. There is no sort of necessity for keeping them in large stock on hand. There is but one reason why distillers of these whiskies are asking the passage of this bill. That is, that if the bourbon and rye whiskies are forced upon the market at a low price they will come into competition with their product and thus curtail the volume of their business in the future.

But the producers of the bourbon and rye whiskies stand upon a different footing. They say it is necessary their whiskies should lie in bond for some two or three years before they are fit for use; that they have to anticipate the market, and that, anticipating a better demand and a more profitable market than they have to-day, they overproduced. That is their case, I think, as fairly as it can be stated by its advocates themselves.

Now, then, is there any reason why these distillers should have any preference over the ordinary tax-payer? Most of us here represent other interests. Why is it that the producer of whisky should have any relief, any special legislation for him, that can not reach the producer of wheat or the producer of pork or the grower of cotton? The gentleman from Missouri who has spoken on this bill [Mr. BROADHEAD] said, as I understood him, that the law singled out the producers of whisky and imposed a large tax upon their product, and therefore he contends that the distiller, instead of standing before us in the attitude of one asking a favor, is really only here to be relieved of an invidious distinction the law makes against him.

Now let us see. To the average tax-payer the day for the payment of taxes comes like death. And, as a gentleman near me suggests, like death it is unwelcome. It is inevitable; he can not avoid it. He did not take it upon himself, but the law put it upon him. On the other hand the producer of whisky welcomes this tax. He surveyed the ground before he commenced the business. He knew what the law was. He made his calculation. And he said to himself, "I can make this business profitable; I calculate that it will be a good investment." And upon that idea he began the business. In other words, he voluntarily assumed for the sake of gain, whether legitimate or not is not the question here, the payment of these taxes. And now he says he made a mistake, and we ought to relieve him from the consequences of that mistake. Mr. Chairman, mistakes are made by those in every occupation. Farmers fail; merchants fail; manufacturers fail. But all must take and have heretofore taken the consequences of their own miscalculations. The whisky men are the exceptions. They heretofore have asked of Congress relief when they wanted it, and Congress heretofore, except in the last House, has granted them the relief.

If we grant that relief again under these circumstances, why do we do it? How much rye and bourbon whisky is there on hand? On the 1st day of January of this year the amount in bond was 64,000,000 of gallons. That has three years within which to pay taxes. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who favors the bill, in his letter on the subject says that the annual consumption of whisky, bourbon and rye whiskies, in this country is about 18,000,000 gallons. Now, three times 18,000,000 gallons, or 54,000,000, would pay taxes and be consumed during three years. The whiskies that are to pay taxes in the three coming years, the rye and bourbon whiskies, amount to 64,000,000 gallons, and the consumption, according to the estimate of Mr. Evans, would be 54,000,000; so that the surplus that oppresses these men to be distributed in these three years is simply 10,000,000 gallons for the whole United States.

And so all this cry of a panic that is to come upon the country if this relief is not granted grows out of the fact that there are 64,000,000 gallons of this rye and Bourbon whisky in bond to-day that is to pay taxes in three years, supplemented by the argument that the market is already overstocked with surplus whisky.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me for a motion that the committee rise, he retaining the floor?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope that motion will not be agreed to. I trust the gentleman from Alabama will not be interrupted in his argument. The hour will expire in twenty minutes, and then is the time for the committee to rise.

Mr. HERBERT. I am out of voice, and would prefer to go on in the morning.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me for a motion that the committee rise, he retaining the floor?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope that motion will not be agreed to. I trust the gentleman from Alabama will not be interrupted in his argument. The hour will expire in twenty minutes, and then is the time for the committee to rise.

Mr. HERBERT. I am out of voice, and would prefer to go on in the morning.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the SPEAKER having resumed the chair, Mr. DORSHEIMER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HARRISON presented a preamble and resolutions adopted by the Charles W. Heath Post, No. 109, Department of Indiana, Grand Army of the Republic, and resolutions adopted by the C. C. Mason Post, No. 235, Department of Indiana, Grand Army of the Republic, favoring the passage of various relief measures for the benefit of soldiers now pending before Congress; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 219) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Missouri River between its mouth and the mouth of the Dakota or James River, and across the Mississippi River between the port of Saint Paul, in the State of Minnesota, and the port of Natchez, in the State of Mississippi, and across the Illinois River between its mouth and Peoria, in the State of Illinois, and to prescribe the character, location, and dimensions of the same, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1797) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1567) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, reported it adversely; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. 954) for the relief of F. Prosh and T. F. McElroy, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1896) to empower the Secretary of War to permit the establishment, under certain conditions, of a horse-railway upon and over the island of Rock Island and the bridges erected by the United States connecting the cities of Davenport and Rock Island therewith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1898) to provide for the admission into the Union of the State of Tacoma, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLATT. The bill relates to the admission of Washington Territory as a State. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT. I think that amendments which are presented to appropriation bills ought to be placed upon our desks. Since the new rule by which only reports and bills reported from committees and placed on the Calendar are put upon our desks, we do not find before us proposed amendments to appropriation bills or to any bills which are under consideration. I think that papers of that character ought to be distributed and placed upon our desks. I do not know that any rule is necessary on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection amendments offered to appropriation bills and printed will be distributed on the desks of Senators. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SALARIES OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up the bill (S. 1852) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1852) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MORGAN to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall apply only to judges that shall be hereafter appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is entitled to the floor on the pending amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I had nearly concluded my remarks on this bill yesterday, and would not go on to-day, I believe, but for the earnest and polite invitation extended to me by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who expressed for the first time in his life a very amiable desire that I should be heard further upon the bill. I am always disposed to yield to any such request coming from that Senator, for he very rarely makes it, and I regard it as a great compliment. The Senate always loves to find the Senator from Massachusetts in a nice, good humor. It reminds one of washing-day with the scolding left out, and I always feel disposed to take a holiday when I find the Senator from Massachusetts wants me to proceed to discuss any question in the spirit of amiability which he indicated yesterday.

The question is a grave one for this body to consider. I mentioned yesterday the effect that our legislation would have upon the future of this country if we should raise this salary to $5,000 for all the judges of the district court and supplement it, as we should be compelled to do, I suppose very soon, by raising the salaries of the Territorial judges to the same amount of money.

We give to the district judges of the United States under this bill what is equivalent to an annuity for life of $5,000 per annum. The sum of money at 6 per cent. which would be necessary to raise that annuity would be $83,333.33. At the present time it is between $63,000 and $66,000. We propose to raise it $20,000 in the case of each of these judges, which is equivalent to taking out of the Treasury of the United States $20,000 and putting it at interest at 6 per cent. for the purpose of raising this additional stipend in favor of men who accepted their offices upon a very much lower basis of pay.

I referred yesterday to the advantages also of having a life estate in an office, an income upon which a person could rely during the whole period of his life. I expressed the opinion, which I still entertain and which I think is just, that an estate of that kind limited to a man for life is of very much higher value than would be an annual office of $5,000, such as a Senator or a member of the House of Representatives gets, and for which he has to take the chances of election and re-election from time to time. Therefore we are conferring upon these gentlemen a very large bounty.

I have sought to obtain from the Committee on the Judiciary some information, some state of facts, that would justify us in increasing this stipend so largely, predicated upon some additional reasons, some public service, some improvement of the public service to be gained by the money that we are thus expending. Nothing of that sort has been argued, nothing has been stated or suggested of that kind, except that Senators have essayed to say that as a matter of policy, as a matter of principle, we ought to give large salaries to our judges. Suppose that is a correct principle, I contend that the application of it in the present case is wrong. There is no necessity for it. We get nothing by the outlay. We do not improve the service merely by increasing the pay from $3,500 to $5,000 a year of those men who are now in office. We get no return for it at all. It might be a gracious thing to do; it might be a benevolent thing to do; but the question that we are to consider here is, is the public service improved by this expenditure? Does the Government of the United States gain anything by this additional expenditure which it has not already acquired? If there is a necessity in any case for the increase of salary, is there any reason why a Senator should not get up here and propound that necessity in the form of a bill, as has been done heretofore frequently, and let us vote upon the particular case and upon the particular necessity?

There is no reason why some judges who are not worth more than $3,500 a year should be boosted up into salaries of $5,000 a year because some other judges are entitled to $5,000 who are only getting $3,500. There is no logic in that statement of the proposition, and there is no justice in it.

It has been urged against the amendment which I have had the honor to propose that it would be a hard requirement upon a judge to say to him, "If you want to get the five-thousand-dollar salary you must resign your position and get a reappointment and a reconfirmation by the Senate." There is no injustice in that, for if the judge has earned a reputation upon the bench in the public service which entitles him to a reappointment he would undoubtedly get it, and he need have no false modesty or reluctance about resigning in order to get it. There is no stigma put upon him when we place before him the reward of an additional salary upon the condition that he sees proper to release his hold upon his office and let us examine his record and see whether in the particular case he is a man who deserves it or who has earned the reputation upon which we propose to reward him.

I have no disposition to strike at the Federal bench, to reduce salaries, if I had the power (and we have no power of that kind), or to put them under any new conditions that are not consistent with a sound public policy and with wisdom. All my inclinations have been the other way. During my whole life as a lawyer I have been in favor of giving to the judicial officers, both of the State and the Federal Government, ample compensation, so that they should live lives of entire independence and some degree of comfort, so that they should have an opportunity also of devoting themselves assiduously and without unnecessary interruption from poverty or other causes to the public service. I believe in the doctrine of placing the judges of the United States in a position of independence. But, sir, we have been growing in this country not alike in all parts of it. Some portions of our country have become much more important and populous than others in consequence of the fact that they have enjoyed larger commerce, larger influx of population, greater accumulations of wealth. In those regions of country it is due to the public service that we should increase the judicial salaries. Yet in a large portion of the country the work of the judiciary remains comparatively unimportant. The time of the judges is not very largely occupied in some of the districts. Some of them are small, unimportant districts in respect to the litigation that is pending in them. Why should we abandon the system under which we have put the salaries of the different judges in the more heavily populated communities at higher rates, and thereby have equalized the salary according to the labor that is to be performed, and strike out for a new one which places $5,000 as the uniform salary of the judges throughout the United States and fixes that upon us beyond the power of appeal?

I have had occasion in discussing this measure to make reference to the fact that some of the judges of the Southern States in my opinion are not men who are in every sense qualified for the high positions that they are intrusted with. That has been the misfortune of the country. It has been the inconvenience that the Government has been placed under of finding political partisans in the South who are men of competent ability to discharge the duties of these high offices. The result is that we have had to take men of inferior capacity and sometimes of very low character.

When a man through these misfortunes has been fixed upon a section of the country we find that there is no chance to get rid of him except by impeachment, and we find that that is a remedy which is entirely ineffectual, because no one would think now of putting a judge before the House of Representatives for impeachment or before the Senate for trial with any expectation of having the case determined during a session of Congress. So the remedy by impeachment upon which our fathers relied for freeing the bench of incompetent persons is a remedy which by stress of circumstances has become obsolete. It has been a number of years since any impeachment was attempted. The last one that was attempted in the House of Representatives I believe was of a judge from my own State, and there was so much difficulty and embarrassment about getting the matter attended to for want of time that he would have gone scot-free; it would have been impossible to have impeached him; and had it not been for the pressure of public opinion that enabled us to free ourselves of that judge we should not have been relieved.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], in a very splendid speech that he made once in this body while conducting an impeachment against a public officer, referred to the fact that he had witnessed the pressure of public opinion driving I believe as many as three judges from the bench. They were not impeached but driven off. They could not probably have been impeached for want of time on the part of these bodies to try them.

Now you propose to increase these salaries. I say I will vote for your bill to give $5,000 salary, though I think that is a very exorbitant rate, if you will put a proviso in it that the measure shall apply in futuro only, and if there are any judges in the United States who wish to retain their places at $3,500 let them put their own prices upon themselves. Let them say, "I would prefer to hold this place at $3,500 rather than take the risk of going before the President of the United States and the Senate of the United States for the vindication of my record and my conduct and my character as a judge."

The Department of Justice has been pretty active during the last twelve months in the investigation of officers connected with the courts in almost all the Southern States and in some of the Northern States. About $24,000 of public money has been expended in those investigations, and the subject is still going on, not merely through the officers of the Department of Justice, but it is going on in the other House of Congress. A committee has been organized there for the purpose of investigating what? Frauds and villainies in the administration of law in the United States. The Department of Public Justice, of which of course the circuit and district courts comprise the most essential element, is arraigned now before the people of the United States upon charges connected with its administration; and what do we find? We find developments there that would have shocked any people in the worst days of fraud in the English Government or in fact in any government in the world. We find the reports of the officers of the Department of Justice showing that subordinate officers of the judicial establishments in this country have been systematically and regularly swindling the people out of thousands and thousands of dollars and persecuting the people also, in order to get a chance to swindle the Government. Says the chief special agent of the Department in his report to the Attorney-General:

> You are aware that the fee system of compensating court officers has been found unreliable and unjust to the Government as well as to the citizen forced to appear in the United States courts. As a result of the examiners' investigations of the accounts of marshals, commissioners, and others, you were pleased to recommend to Congress in your last annual report the propriety of compensating court officers by salaries instead of fees. In the interest of the Government and the citizens it is hoped that your recommendation will be favorably acted upon, for it will be seen by reference to reports made by different examiners concerning the business of the courts in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, New York, Pennsylvania, and Texas that the abuses of the fee system are not confined to any district or section of country, but are, with a few notable exceptions, so prevalent and so odious that it is not to be wondered at that deputy marshals and deputy collectors of internal revenue have been shot down as if they were the enemies of the people.

The fact of their having been shot down is a fact that had escaped my attention in the portion of the country to which my attention has been particularly directed, my own State. But here is a revelation of which that is a substantial statement, a revelation of fact showing maladministration in the management of the courts in the South and in the North, in New York and Pennsylvania as well as in the Southern States, which is utterly shocking, and which, I must say, is sustained by the facts which are presented by this agent, and are also further sustained by the facts which have come out in the testimony before the committee of the House of Representatives. Now, what effect, it may be inquired, has this upon the judges? Why, sir, the very worst men in the whole South in the abuse of what is termed justice there have been the United States commissioners. In my own State the records show that there are men there who have been for years and years tolerated in office when the judges knew, for their attention was specifically called to it, not only in person, but I have called their attention and the attention of the country to it on the floor of the Senate myself—the judges knew that these commissioners were sending out drag-nets throughout the entire country to haul in innocent men, white and black, for alleged offenses against the public domain, such as cutting timber and the like, nine out of ten of whom were discharged upon a hearing. They were brought from distances varying from fifty miles to three hundred. They were incarcerated in prison without any necessity for it at all, and enormous expenses were incurred against the Government. The bills have been sent here and they have been paid, and these commissioners would so manage, having the deputy marshals circulating about distant regions of the State, as that they would sit in Montgomery day after day during almost every working day in the year, and they would demand in addition to their ordinary fees in each case $5 a day from the Government of the United States for sitting in those courts. A more gross and unjustifiable, a more cruel abuse of liberty in the name of justice was never inflicted upon a people in this world. It is stated that in the county of Covington in my State there is scarcely any who have not been called to Montgomery for the purpose of being tried by a United States commissioner upon some allegation connected with the taking of timber or the taking of wood or something of that sort from the public land.

These judges have sat there and they have known this thing to be going on. They have not removed these men; they have not indicted them; they have not rebuked them. They have encouraged them in their wrong, and that extends through various of the Southern States according to the report of the Department of Justice made to Congress.

I should like to know in the presence of these facts whether the Senate expects me to reward those judges by raising their salary from $3,500 to $5,000. The reward that I would give them, if I had the power to do it, would be to bring them to judgment before the Senate for their misbehavior in the neglect of their duties upon the bench whereby the people have been made to suffer and the Government has been swindled. I wish when the vote is taken on this bill that it shall be in contrast with these facts, and I desire to hear some Senator who proposes to support this bill to add this $1,500 a year reward to these men to rise in his place and deny what I have stated upon this subject. If he can do that successfully he can answer my argument, but he can not do it otherwise.

Here, sir, we are passing over reports of this kind that are brought to the Senate and laid upon our table, facts which ought to arouse the Senate to demand investigation and inquiry into these wrongs and outrages by the judges; and the first thing we do, instead of inquiring and instead of exposing and holding up to public scorn and contumely the men who are engaged in these things, is to reward them by increasing their salary $1,500 a year, not merely for their lives, but as long as this Government shall stand this is to be the law, for when you put it on the statute-book you can never afterward repeal it.

Mr. President, I have gone as far in this matter as I intend to go, so far as I am personally concerned. I have stated my reasons for desiring that this measure shall not apply to the bench as it exists unless they on their part shall consent to come back before this body and give us some opportunity to inquire into their character and their doings. I want investigation of this matter, and it is the only means I know of by which it can be obtained.

The district judges, the circuit judges, and the Supreme judges of the United States are the only men in the whole Government, except the Army and Navy officers, who are entirely independent of public opinion; and enough has been disclosed in the facts laid by the President before the Senate during the present session of Congress to satisfy us that we ought not to encourage and reward men who, while they are made by the law independent of public opinion, seem to have no respect for it. The safeguard of the liberties of this country depends upon the fact of the responsibility of all men in this land, as far as our Constitution will admit it, to the people of this country. If I felt that I had a life estate in the Senate I should dread, I should shudder, to think of the impression it might make on my mind of independence toward the people I represent, which would after a while culminate into antagonism, perhaps into tyranny, on my part. Here we have the judges of the district court of the United States who have no responsibility whatever to the people of the States in which they hold their courts. They do not confess to any moral responsibility, any legal responsibility, or any social responsibility to those people. Perhaps it may be one of the qualities of judgment upon the bench that a man shall be removed from responsibilities of this kind; but when that is the case and we find that the functions of office are being discharged in a way to wrong whole communities and to assist fraud and wrong against the Government instead of being a check upon it, then I am for seizing any opportunity that may come along that will enable me to lend a hand to its correction. I can not sit down idly and refuse to speak lest I might by speaking offend the delicate taste of some gentlemen and allow matters of this kind to go on without some examination.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the picture drawn by the Senator from Alabama of the oppression of the citizens of certain States is very shocking, and I am disposed to believe that it is entirely true, for he has vouched for many of these facts by the authority of the agents of the Attorney-General as stated in his last annual report.

I find by law that the power of appointment of United States commissioners is vested in the circuit courts of the United States. So it reads in section 627 of the Revised Statutes:

> Each circuit court may appoint, in different parts of the district for which it is held, so many discreet persons as it may deem necessary.

Now in the first place if this power of appointment is vested in the circuit courts, perhaps it may disarm part of the Senator's criticism upon the results of the misconduct of these commissioners that the salaries proposed to be affected by this law are not those of the judges of the circuit court.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Delaware will allow me to suggest to him that the judges of the district court frequently hold the circuit court, and have the right to do it when no circuit judge is present.

Mr. BAYARD. The district judge may hold a circuit court in the absence of the circuit judge, but they do not constitute the circuit court, nor can they make the appointments now in question, nor do they. That I think my friend will agree to. I am not speaking of the circuit court powers of the district judges, but I am speaking of the powers of the circuit courts to appoint the commissioners. I believe that it is so. Section 627 provides for their appointment.

Now if it be true that the district judges have not the power nor responsibility for the appointment of the commissioners under whose authority this monstrous system of injustice and outrage upon the citizens has been conducted, then it seems to me that the objection to the district judges' salaries can scarcely be said to be applicable. If it were applied to the circuit judges, the effect of the argument might possibly be different.

But I would ask this of my friend from Alabama, how many of the district judges have the control in any way over the cases of abuse of power to which he has referred brought before them under warrants issued by the commissioners? How many does he believe to have been connected with an approval or rather with a failure to disapprove of this system of terrorization and outrage? There are fifty district judges in the United States; how many come within the Senator's view in the condemnation to which I think he has very properly given vent in this Chamber?

Mr. MORGAN. I will say that none of them have come within my personal view except as an observer of the current of events in my own State. I, however, referred to the report made by the officers of the Department of Justice as showing that this has prevailed in several of the States. They are named, and I have read them. The States of Texas, Pennsylvania, New York, Georgia, Arkansas, and Alabama have been named in this report.

Mr. BAYARD. I think therefore the number of inculpated district judges is six out of fifty. If it were a separate question or capable of being made a separate question, whether I would increase the salary of any judge of the United States who was proven to have aided, permitted, or winked at oppression, who it was proven having the power to repress or rebuke these outrages had yet consented to them, I would be not only reluctant but absolutely unwilling to assist in any such inferential approval of his conduct. I go with the Senator from Alabama and say that there may be acts of omission as fatal, as dangerous as any of commission, that a judge who permits his court to be made the theater of oppression and outrage is just as guilty as the witness who is suborned or as the district attorney or prosecuting officer who suborns him or in any way prostitutes the powers of his office.

And, Mr. President, I am sorry to say that I also believe that the entire machinery of legislation, certainly that connected with the elections in this country, has been conceived in a partisan spirit and has been executed in a basely partisan manner. I think I am safe in standing here in the Senate and proclaiming, as I now do, that none but men of one political party have ever been indicted or called to answer at the bar of justice for violation of the United States election laws. I answer for that part of the country with which I am personally acquainted, and there I allege it to be the case. I will not speak so confidently in regard to other parts of the country with which I am not so personally acquainted; but having been a careful, interested, a vigilant observer, I state these facts here in the face of the Senate without fear of contradiction.

If this be so, certainly that judiciary that should hold the scales of justice evenly ought to be protectors of the parties defendant in those courts when they believe that the instigating cause of the prosecution has been the prejudice and heat of politics, and not the desire for public justice. All this is true. It is sadly true. It is one of the serious facts which the American people will soon be called upon to consider, together with the many others that affect their interests and welfare. But, Mr. President, I see these things, I recognize their danger, because he must be short-sighted indeed who does not see that these precedents of injustice and abuse of power will always come, like chickens, back to roost; that in the ebb and flow of political power, in its shifting sands that change from one side to the other, it may well be, and at a day not far distant, when this dangerous power of using legislative and judicial influences to persecute and punish party opponents may recoil upon those who have invented and set them in motion. But the cure undoubtedly lies in the administration. Bad administration, whether of the powers of prosecution or the powers of judgment and the conduct of cases, will alike produce utter injustice and overthrow laws which in just hands might be capable of beneficent operation. It is that broad question as to whether the great powers of the Government that were designed for the benefit and protection of all have been confined to the single use of one party's hostilities, and that party vindictiveness and not public justice has been both the object and the result of the administration of great public powers. That, sir, is a question which the history of this country in the past ten years will go far to illustrate, and which will at no distant day be submitted to the people of this country for their judgment.

But this bill does not, in my opinion, touch that important question. It is another question of broad and important public policy, as to the compensation of judicial officers who have not the control of the appointment or removal of this delinquent class—I call them delinquents, but might better style them criminals—the commissioners who prostitute their powers by issuing warrants in the wholesale, shameful, cruel, and oppressive manner which has been depicted by the Senator from Alabama. Those judges have not their pay in question. It is fifty men, whose number may from time to time be enlarged, who are intrusted with duties calling for a high degree of legal learning, personal character, and professional ability. Of these fifty but six are alleged to have condoned these offenses either by express or tacit approval, and surely it is not just to visit the supposed sins of the six upon the forty-four who are not implicated. Is it economy to the people, is the poor man and the friendless assisted by having an incompetent and unlearned judge? Is he benefited by having some weak tool of power, who is either corrupt or corruptible, to sit upon his case? No, sir. His only chance, and the great chance for the unfriended and for the weak, is the elevation of character and the ability of the court before whom he goes for trial.

I do not say that excessive salaries will procure a proportionate ability; but I do say that an insufficient salary excludes from the office the class of men whom it is the highest interest of the people should occupy the bench. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] read a very interesting and elaborate historical sketch of the gradual increase of judicial salaries from the earlier and simpler days of the Republic to the present time. It was well that he should have read it. It was instructive. It told of the march of luxury, of the growth of the country, the increase of the duties, and of the popular opinion of appreciation of those duties that has dictated a corresponding advance in the pay. Why, sir, until the act of 1870 was passed it was an absolute reproach and scandal to the people of this country that men were kept upon the bench and upon the Supreme Bench of the United States compelled after long and faithful service to the country, not to be measured by pecuniary salaries, but to be measured by a people's gratitude and an appreciation of those services that would endure for generations—men were kept upon the bench because no degree of frugality, no manner of life, however simple and consistent with their position, would permit them to lay by one dollar for the support of their families. When borne down by age and infirmities they were obliged still to carry their enfeebled forms upon the bench in order to receive the salary necessary to keep them from starvation. Sir, it was the conspicuous case of that great, learned, and excellent jurist and patriot Roger B. Taney that caused the Congress of the United States, with too tardy recognition after his death, to say that men who had served so long and well should be enabled to retire for a little breathing space between their labors and the grave, and not be condemned to pass their last hours in want and suffering. Sir, it is known that the children, the widowed daughters of that great man were compelled to labor for their daily bread, and to be the recipients of voluntary aid from members of the legal profession throughout this country because their father during the long years of his faithful public service never had received such a salary as would have permitted him to lay by a moderate sum that might stand between his children and the absolute poverty they were compelled to face.

There never was a more just or a wiser act passed by Congress than that law by which a man 70 years old who had served ten years on the bench should for the remnant of those days, if he chose, if ill-health or disease compelled him, be allowed to retire from labor and be supported for the short remnant of his days with propriety and comfort.

Sir, this bill may in some instances reward men who do not deserve it, but shall we for that reason withhold it from the many who do deserve it? While this bill was under discussion the other day I met a professional friend from the city of New York in whose law firm were two gentlemen who had been district judges of the United States, one in Connecticut and the other in the State of New York, and who, as he said, had borne starvation as long as they could, and had finally been compelled to resign from the district bench and go back to the ranks of the profession, where their abilities enabled them to earn many times over the present judicial salary.

So, Mr. President, I will go heart and hand with my friend from Alabama in condemning and in voting for the reformation of the evils and the outrages which he has referred to; but I do not think this amendment is the way to meet them. I do not think it would be an efficient way to meet them. I can not, therefore, support his amendment.

Sir, it is all-important for the people of this country that nothing should exist to keep the highest class of professional talent and personal character from administering the laws of this country from judicial station. It is in that view that I have voted for this general advance in salary of the judges, and not from any failure on my part to appreciate fully the wrongs, the cruelties, the maladministration which has gone on in many parts of this country and which seems to have met unfortunately so little disapproval in quarters where it ought to have been disapproved. The country in certain portions is ransacked to find some element to condemn among the disorderly classes, who will stain the good name of any community. Such disorder undoubtedly is to be condemned, but I declare it is not one-tenth part so dangerous, not one-tenth part so reprehensible, as the use of public power given for the sacred purposes of justice and perverted to individual oppression by partisan and official malignity.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, there has been no bill before the Committee on the Judiciary since I have been connected with that committee which has given me as much work and as much labor and investigation as this bill. I support the bill as it came from the committee, and I will give the reasons briefly to the Senate which induce me to do so.

Very early in the session general bills were introduced and various bills to increase the salaries of the district judges in particular cases. They all went to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they were reported back by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] with a list increasing the salaries of some fourteen or fifteen probably to the sum of $5,000 and several others to the sum of $4,000. That bill was scarcely reported at the Secretary's desk before there was a buzz in the Senate to know why this judge was omitted and that one and the other; and upon the request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], he stating that there was some cause of complaint of this discrimination in his State, the bill was recommitted to the committee. Thereupon a number of communications were received in the way of data as to the labor of the different district judges and as to the number of days it required them to do their work; in other words, the exaction upon their time. The committee, not being able to come to any other conclusion, finally agreed to report an increase of all to $5,000. If they had stopped short of that and met simply the personal demands of Senators and other persons in reference to particular district judges the list probably would have been at least thirty-four or thirty-five. We were brought to this alternative: not to increase at all or to take the entire list.

The opponents of this measure, as I understand, are willing to vote for an increase in particular cases where the facts would warrant that increase. The committee found that at least thirty-four or thirty-five are entitled to an increase, and in view of the objection made to discriminations we became satisfied that no bill would pass unless we increased them all to $5,000. I am aware that the services of some of the district judges may not be worth that much, but there are others worth much more than this sum, and who perform duties for which a much larger sum would not compensate. So I was not willing for one to refuse to increase the pay of these meritorious judges if we were compelled even to increase the pay in doubtful cases or in cases that we knew were not meritorious.

Now, take the State that I represent in part on this floor. We have a district judge with circuit-court powers at Fort Smith. He is occupied two hundred and ninety-two days in the year holding his court, and it is not a holiday court; it is not a fashionable court; but it meets at 8 o'clock, takes a recess for dinner, and adjourns at about 6 in the evening, in the fashion of the old school. The district judge at Little Rock has to go to Helena to hold his court at a great expense, and his court at Little Rock is held open for the same length of time as the court at Fort Smith. There are two cases where if the judges are worth $100 according to any standard by which I can compute such services they are worth $5,000. A number of cases which the Senator from Massachusetts has on his list are equally striking as the two I have instanced.

Mr. President, the theory on which salaries were fixed at the foundation of the Government, on which they were regulated many times in the past, it will not do to apply at this particular time and period for several reasons. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] yesterday gave one of them when he stated that the purchasing power of the $3,500 that Chief-Justice Marshall received on the Supreme Bench went further then than $10,000 goes now that the judges on the same bench receive at this day. So the salaries of $1,000 and $1,200 or of $2,000 for district judges alluded to yesterday by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in his very able speech went further in that day than three times the same salary would go now.

The analogy fails for another reason. When the district courts were organized, in the early part of the Government, they had but little business comparatively speaking The business of the country in those courts has grown enormously, and almost every conceivable question that can be imagined is before them for adjudication. The district judge that sat at Little Rock when the war came on had, I believe, about thirty-five cases, all told, upon his docket. Now the judge on that same bench has between three hundred and fifty and five hundred cases; and it is in the same ratio with the court at Fort Smith.

Both as to the purchasing power of the salary and as to the amount of labor the comparison fails utterly. The theory of fixing these salaries started on the idea that we would give the United States district judges the salaries the States gave their highest judges; but for the two reasons stated it was found that that would not do, and so a change was made.

In addition to that, it will not do to say because the poverty-stricken State of Arkansas, for instance, is only enabled to give her supreme judges, I am ashamed to say, $3,000 a year, therefore the United States, that is able to compensate its judges, should not give them more than $3,000 a year. If the argument is good, it will hold good in a respect which I wish to state now for the benefit of gentlemen. When the present government of Arkansas was organized the public officials received their pay in State scrip. I happened to be one of them then, the governor of the State of Arkansas. State scrip at that time and for four and a half months afterward was worth 22 cents on the dollar. That was all the pay we got. Now, if the argument is good that we should regulate the salaries according to what the States pay, we should follow this barometer according to the State scrip or currency, or whatever it is paid in, as it rises or goes down. The salary of the supreme judges of Arkansas cited by the Senator from Mississippi is lamentably and ridiculously low, but it is the best that the State can do. There are great exactions on the time of these judges. The State is not able to pay them better, but we are looking forward to the day when we hope we shall be able to pay them better.

The instance of the pay of a member of Congress has been cited. That is ridiculously low, and but for the retroactive effect that was given to the law raising it to $7,500 it would be that sum now.

So, Mr. President, on all the grounds of the comparison, I can not see that the theory of this bill is at all interfered with. We know that it is difficult to fix any rate, difficult to fix any standard. If you take the standard now contended for by my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], of course we see that that will not hold good. He admits we should pay more in individual cases that are meritorious. The bill first reported proposed to raise thirty-four or thirty-five of the judges in their salary, and at once objection was made to that that it did not include some who ought to be increased. It is not a contention for high or extravagant salaries, but it is simply a contention for good, substantial, reasonable, fair pay for the performance of these duties. The people will not, as I understand, quibble or quarrel about good, substantial salaries; they are willing to pay such salaries; but they want vigorous and diligent and conscientious work in return for it. This rendered, they will not and do not grudge liberal compensation.

Something has been said as to the effect of a life tenure of office. It is true that that circumstance attaches to the office of United States district judge, but there are other circumstances that attach also. Here the judge is taken from the ordinary business of men; he can not engage in speculation, he can not attach himself to corporations, because he does not know when they may come before him for adjudication. He lives to his good, ripe old age, if you please, with a family growing up around him to be fed and educated. In the case indicated yesterday by the Senator from Mississippi about pensioning special judges—that was the case of Judge Hunt—I can not believe there was anything wrong in that. That was a particular case.

Mr. GEORGE. I did not say there was anything wrong in it.

Mr. GARLAND. No; but it was specially mentioned.

Mr. GEORGE. I referred to it as one of the results of the life tenure; that was all. There was no other way of getting rid of him.

Mr. GARLAND. Exactly. He was upon the bench, he was paralyzed, unable to perform the duties of his office, he had nothing to go back on; he was gone beyond the chance of practicing his profession; he had become paralyzed in the public service; the docket was accumulating, and it was necessary something should be done for him with a view to the public business. Now, the docket of the Supreme Court stands here every year with 1,200 to 1,300 cases to be determined and passed upon by that court in some way or other, whereas in the olden times, before the war, there were hardly ever more than two hundred cases on that docket. On the 14th of April, 1861, there were but two hundred and twenty cases on the docket of the Supreme Court undisposed of.

These are the reasons, which, after careful consideration of this subject, prompted me to vote for the bill before the committee and will prompt me to vote for it here.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question. He made a statement as to the purchasing power of a dollar in the early part of the century, that it was three times as great as it is now. I should like to know from the Senator what information he has on that subject which authorizes him to make such a statement, contrary to my observation and to my reading.

Mr. GARLAND. I think, as a fact, that the sum of $1,000 from 1843 to 1860 and the coming on of the war would purchase more than the sum of $3,000 in the last ten years here. I can take the bills of fare of the country, the simplest things we consume every day, and show this to be the fact. In 1849, for example, when I traveled from Bardstown, Ky., on horseback to Arkansas, I with my horse staid overnight at as good a place as a man would want to stay this side of heaven and it never cost me over 50 cents a night for me and my horse. And as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is near me, I should like to know where there is now a house on that road where a man and a horse could be taken care of for a night, get breakfast, and leave next morning for less than a dollar and a quarter or a dollar and a half. At that day and time the Senator from Kentucky knows well enough that as good a pint of liquor as ever cheered the fallen or depressed spirit of men could be purchased for from 5 to 10 cents, and he knows and I know that it can not be purchased now for less than 25 or 30 cents. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORGAN. If we could repeal the tax on whisky we should relieve the bench to that extent to say the least, and I have no doubt that would be a relief, and a good many of them would be very much obliged to us for cheapening whisky.

My amendment does not attack the amount of this salary; it is only intended to provide what I think the committee omitted to notice as to the persons to whom it shall apply and the conditions upon which it shall apply. I propose that it shall apply to those persons only who shall hereafter be appointed. I appreciate the difficulties of the Committee on the Judiciary in arriving at a just sum to be fixed as compensation for these judges, the embarrassments that they had when they reported back certain bills to increase the salaries of some fifteen or eighteen judges as I believe the Senator from Arkansas said, and I have not as yet undertaken to reduce the amount of $5,000 provided for in this bill.

But I rose, Mr. President, for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate, and of the Senator from Delaware particularly who is not now in his seat, to the fact that the accounts of the different officers, the marshals, clerks, attorneys, and commissioners of the circuit courts, before they are sent to the Treasury of the United States to be audited, are required by section 846 of the code to be examined and certified by the judge of the district for which they are appointed. It may be true, as the Senator from Delaware contends, that the commissioners of the United States are appointed by the circuit courts and are to be removed by the circuit courts, and that the circuit courts in that sense can only be held by circuit judges. I do not concede the proposition, but I will do it for the sake of the argument. The point I made, however, on the report made by the chief examiner of the Department of Justice was that on the examination of the accounts of the commissioners, of the clerks and marshals in the Southern States and in the Northern States too, they found a vast amount of fraud and peculation, and this fraud and peculation had escaped the discernment of the judges whose duty it is to examine and certify to the accounts. It is the district judges who have that duty, and not the circuit judges.

We have an able circuit judge in the fifth circuit, a man whose course on the bench I am very proud to applaud on the floor of the Senate; but he has five or six States, from Georgia to Texas, an enormous area of territory, over which he has to travel, and it is a matter of impossibility that he should watch the conduct of the different commissioners and clerks and marshals throughout the districts. Congress recognized that it was impossible for him to do it, and required of the district judges that they should make these examinations.

Now, let me ask any man who has ever practiced before the bar of any court of this country, or any man who has ever witnessed the conduct of business within a court, if he finds the officers of that court slack and negligent in their dealings with public affairs, and the very affairs about which this criminal conduct exists have to pass under the examination of the judge and receive his certificate, and where the matter is carried on from year to year and in the face of protests, would he not come to the conclusion that that judge was himself a delinquent, that he cared nothing for the responsibilities or duties of his office?

Here your officers go to the States of Alabama, Georgia, Texas, Mississippi, Pennsylvania, New York, and elsewhere. They make these examinations; they find fraud abounding throughout the whole history for years past in these courts. Cases have lain there of criminal conduct toward the Treasury of the United States without investigation, and the statute of limitations comes in as a bar, and men can not be indicted, and it is so stated in these reports, because of the bar of the statute of limitations. Now, are we to infer that these judges who have the control over these officers have been performing their duty when the law requires that they shall examine and certify the various accounts in which these frauds exist? Let me demonstrate to you the impossibility of such a thing as that.

Here is the commissioner that I mentioned in Alabama; he sits almost every day in the year, and his accounts in the Treasury show it, and charges the Government of the United States $5 a day for a session in addition to the fees that belong to the respective cases that he hears. He returns case after case into the courts until the docket accumulates by hundreds—many hundreds of cases. The judge opens his court, and the country is surprised, and the Senate has often been surprised, and Senators have remarked their surprise upon that proposition here, to see that the courts when they are opened employ themselves for hours and hours each day in simply nolprossing cases. So flagrant has this evil become in Alabama, that when Judge Pardee came around and examined into the condition of affairs there he caused orders to be issued and circulated to the different commissioners that they should not send out a warrant of arrest against any human being for any offense at all unless the man who asked for that warrant should swear to his personal knowledge of a violation of the laws. What were those requirements meant for? To meet the case that men were employed by the commissioners day after day to stand at their side and make affidavits and swear out warrants against persons whom they might suspect of being implicated, knowing nothing of the facts at all. These cases accumulate on the docket, hundreds and hundreds of them. The judge finds it necessary on the presentation of the facts by the district attorney to nolpross them, turn them out of court. The commissioner comes in who caused these arrests and the marshal and deputy marshals who are alleged to have made the arrests come in with their accounts predicated upon the very service which the court has been notified of upon the records of the court, and thereupon the judge makes examination, if he does his duty under the statute, and gives his certificate that these accounts are just and true and lawful claims against the Government of the United States. And yet your Department of Justice here is now engaged in a praiseworthy necessary vindication of the Treasury of the United States against the corrupt practices of these subordinates certified to by the judges on the bench.

It makes no difference whether these officers are appointed by the circuit court or whether they are removed by the circuit court; the accounts through which and in which they offend against public justice and the criminal laws of the land are accounts that are examined and certified to by these very district judges whose salaries we are trying to raise $1,500 a year. These judges know that these accounts can not be just. Here is a circuit judge issuing an order that all these commissioners, trying to hold them down, shall receive affidavits from men who know something about the facts; and here the judges are engaged in nolprossing these numerous cases from the docket sent in by these commissioners, and yet they turn around and pretend to make an examination of the accounts so that they can certify them either upon their oaths or upon their honor as judges and they come here, and the Department of Justice in the execution of its duties investigates them and exposes this serious fraud before the world; and before the Senate of the United States has even adopted resolutions for an examination into these charges we go on to reward these men by an increase of their salaries $1,500 a year. No, sir; let us postpone the operation of this law to appointments hereafter to be made, and let these men come forward and account for these things. Give to a Senator from Texas or Georgia or Alabama or elsewhere where these allegations have been made against these judges and against their administration of public justice the right when a man has been reappointed to get his $5,000 to get up here and show what this judge has been doing in his pretended administration of public justice in the State.

I am willing that they shall have salaries of $5,000; but, Mr. President, if they feel conscious of their rectitude, and if they have the moral support of the country in which they live and of the bar by which they are surrounded and the Government at large, they need have no apprehension that they will not be reappointed. It will only be too gracious a duty for us to perform, too pleasing a duty for us to perform, then to reward such a man with reappointment. We should never crush a man who would say to the Senate of the United States, "I feel that I am entitled by my record and my course of public conduct to this increase of salary; I therefore lay down my commission, and I ask the President to reappoint and the Senate to reconfirm me, so that I can get the $5,000." That would be a fair measure of public justice. There would then be the honorable men on the bench, and it would rid us of some of the bad material which is now disgracing the bench of the United States.

If I had not believed that there was real merit in this, that it would accomplish something for the purification and exaltation of the bench itself, I certainly would not have offered the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be reported again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add:

Provided, That this act shall apply only to judges that shall be hereafter appointed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I do not know how he would vote on this question.

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER]. Will his colleague state how he would vote on this question?

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] would vote "nay" if here.

Mr. HILL. Then I vote "nay."

Mr. LAMAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is absent this morning and is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER]. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] would vote "yea" on this amendment and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded; and the result announced—yeas 14, nays 45; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to offer an amendment, to substitute the word "four" for "five;" so as to read "four thousand" instead of "five thousand" dollars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. VAN WYCK. In the somewhat lengthy discussion upon this bill I have been listening to hear something of a public reason why the Senate should stop at this time to pass a bill of this nature. I have not discovered that there is any danger of the bench being deprived of the judges who are presiding over it. True the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] mentioned the great qualifications which are needed in every person occupying a position upon the bench, but I failed to hear him follow it up with the statement that those upon the bench now did not possess those qualifications. I take it for granted that they do, and that all that is sought for by the Senator from Massachusetts we already have in the judges who are presiding. So there can be no reason on that ground at this time.

Then the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] in his lengthy statement urged a reason purely of sympathy. One thing is noticeable, Mr. President, that there is one class of American citizens who always find a vast deal of sympathy on this floor and in the American Congress, and that is those who hold official positions. So it was with my friend from Delaware. His sympathy overflowed. He could see much of hardship in the family of Judge Taney, who he said were poor; but does my friend from Delaware call up to his recollection other distinguished lawyers who are not upon the bench whose families also are poor and destitute? Is there any reason why there should be any more particular consideration for a distinguished lawyer who goes upon the bench and unfortunately may be poor than for a distinguished lawyer who does not go upon the bench and whose family also may be poor and necessitous?

There is another feature which appears in discussions of this kind. First, I say we always find sympathy for the office-holder. Then some gentlemen believe that the highest privilege of the American citizen and his greatest enjoyment is to pay taxes. Gentlemen point to our overflowing Treasury as an evidence of the great enjoyment it furnishes the American people to fill it.

My friend from Delaware probably does not go down to the thousands of families who are poor, who not only die poor but live poor, thousands of families from whose pockets are extracted the dollars that go into an overflowing Treasury. That is another proposition which always appears in these liberal discussions and liberal appropriations—the pleasure it is to the American people to pay taxes. And then, of course, the necessary corollary is the necessity of the American Congress being liberal in paying out the money. The proposition is first to fill up, and then deplete. There are various ways of doing this. One is the ease with which public offices are filled, and next the apparent ease with which salaries are made and increased.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] speaks of the necessity of the salaries of the judges being equal. Will my friend from Arkansas reflect on the Congress which passed the present law? It was supposed in 1867 when this law was passed that the salaries should be graduated, and they were graduated from $3,500 to $5,000. Was that law just then? Has it been just from 1867 to this day? Gentlemen say no; many judges do more labor than others; it would be liberal and generous to put them all on the same basis. From 1867 to now there has been this discrimination, twelve judges receiving from $4,000 to $5,000; the remainder receiving $3,500. That proposition was just, was equitable. It has remained upon our statute-book from 1867 to now, and there has been no murmur of complaint. Now it is proposed to equalize them. I would ask our generous brethren here, after you have equalized the salaries and placed them all upon the basis of $5,000 a year, how long will it be before judges in districts requiring all of their time will come and find Senators who will ask that that injustice shall be righted? Then we shall hear piteous appeals for them. Is it right that the overtaxed and overworked judges in New York and in Massachusetts and in Pennsylvania should receive no more salary than the judges in the rural districts, where such intricate and difficult questions do not come up for consideration?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator propounds, as I understand, a question to me, and if he would like to have the answer now I will tell him what is my answer to that difficulty. I think the law which has been recently passed would be made practical still more than it is now, requiring the judges to go out of their districts when directed by the circuit judge. So I look forward, I will tell the Senator very frankly, to a period soon to come when every district judge of the United States will be employed all his time, and will be obliged to go about to other districts besides his own. In Massachusetts the district judge in my own district is employed the whole year, and it is a very hard and laborious year's work for him; and for one or two years he has scarcely had a vacation of more than two days. I suppose there are nearly two men's work in that court now, but when a judge comes occasionally from Maine, from New Hampshire, from Rhode Island, the labor will be still more equalized.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator concedes the fact, I suppose, that there are very many districts where the judges are not overworked, and where probably not half their time is required in discharging their official duties.

Mr. HOAR. There are twelve or thirteen districts out of the fifty, as near we can make out, in which the judges now are not worked a hard year's work. I expect that within a very few years every judge within those thirteen districts will be obliged to be constantly employed in doing the work which the others can not perform.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then would it not be best for Congress to wait until that time does arrive?

Mr. HOAR. It has come near enough now.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator thinks it has come near enough now. Possibly that may be in his idea of excessive generosity and liberality; but would it not be well to wait until that time does come if it is to be used as an argument why the salaries are to be increased? The Senator's hope is that in the future it will be so arranged that the district judge of Iowa may be ordered into the district of Nebraska or the judge of the district of Colorado——

Mr. HOAR. The district judges do not go out of the circuit in which their district is.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then that will not meet the difficulty. I take it in the New York and Pennsylvania circuits every district in those circuits is now probably worked up to the maximum of what the Senator considers to be a hard year's labor. Maritime questions, great commercial questions, where large amounts of property are involved, are seldom heard in the interior districts. Therefore it is that in the far distant districts, in the rural districts, where the position is a comparatively easy one, the injustice would still continue, and there is not in those districts for half the year the labor that there is in a hard-worked district the whole year. Therefore, the objection is not removed, and the condition of things that my friend suggests can not possibly exist where the increase will apply most actively. I think that just at this juncture there is no necessity for the proposed increase of these salaries.

It would seem from all the hardships that are mentioned as if there were some sort of draft or conscription into the civil service of this country. When a gentleman overflows with sympathy for the hard-worked office-holder, you would naturally suppose that there was a draft or a conscription which forced the private citizen into a position of trust. But one thing is very remarkable in his suggestion in regard to the profession to which my friend belongs and that of the Senator from Arkansas. It is very remarkable when any position is suggested which that profession can fill that we hear so much of the great sacrifices which gentlemen who come from the bar and from the profession of the law give up to serve their country. We find that from considerations of patriotism the most distinguished lawyers in this country are willing to surrender their chances of fortune to take a position upon the bench; and they are willing from their great degree of patriotism to surrender positions of profit even to take seats in the American Congress, where as Senators claim they are so hard worked that it is necessary to furnish a clerk to each of them to aid them in the discharge of their duties.

As I said there is no conscription, there is no draft that will take a man out of the legal profession and put him on the district bench or the circuit bench or the Supreme Court. There is no power on earth that can take a distinguished lawyer from his remunerative practice and place him in a seat in this Chamber or in the other House. And yet it is impossible, so these gentlemen say, to get a lawyer of distinguished ability to fill these positions at the salary now paid. When there is a district judgeship vacant the whole State is torn up, and every lawyer of prominent position is anxious, if possible, to fill that chair. If there is a vacancy in a circuit judgeship, half a dozen States are torn up, as my friend from Kansas knows—Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not Wisconsin.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Fortunately for Wisconsin that State is not in the circuit to which I allude where a vacancy now exists. The other States I named are in that circuit and they are all torn up. Each has distinguished lawyers, the ablest lawyers, and not too much can be said in their favor, to fill the circuit judgeship. To-day a struggle is going on in that circuit in which my friend from Wisconsin does not reside and in which my friend from Kansas does, and the President is besieged by delegation after delegation from each branch of Congress and citizens from the States probably come in regiments to beg the President to recognize the great merit of a distinguished lawyer in their State. Kansas presents her best man; Minnesota hers, Colorado hers, and Iowa hers, and they come here struggling for this judicial position. Yet we are told of the hardship they have undertaken, and that this great consideration must be extended to them. Certainly when gentlemen accepted the office of district judges at $3,500 it was rather in the nature of a contract; and why should we increase their compensation while they hold their office?

The Senator from Delaware is anxious that the judges shall be well paid. He agrees, he says, with the Senator from Alabama that great outrages have been perpetrated through the judiciary. Did I understand the Senator from Delaware to agree with the Senator from Alabama? The Senator from Alabama was stating his grievances, and I understood the Senator from Delaware to assent to them and to say that there were grievances.

Mr. BAYARD. I was accepting the statement of the Senator from Alabama as true; and if the facts he stated were true, they were gross outrages upon the rights of American citizens which ought to subject their perpetrators to punishment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I understood either that Senator or the Senator from Alabama, I think it was the Senator from Delaware, to state that it was the circuit judge who made the appointments from which the people suffered in Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. The circuit judges made the appointment of commissioners, not of marshals, of course. The marshals are confirmed here.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Precisely; but I wanted in that connection to suggest that it was the high-priced judges that are the cause of the most outrage upon the State of Alabama. The district judges to-day receive $3,500, the circuit judges receive $6,000, and it was the high-priced judges who produced the troubles under which you labor in Alabama, as I understand.

Mr. MORGAN. I went entirely on the report made to the Department of Justice by its chief agent, which I have before me and from which I read. I made no statement of my own in regard to that point.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I was correct about that.

I have made all the suggestions I desire to make upon this matter.

I was anxious principally to see what reason was to be given for this proposed increase, and, with all deference to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, I fail to see any force in his reasoning. As my friend from Delaware was anxious to have high-priced judges, and as I thought the Senator from Alabama had read that the high-priced judges produced the greatest iniquity in his State if not in other States of the South, I wished merely to draw the parallel, and also to show that in my judgment for this proposed legislation to-day it might be well to level the salary up to $4,000.

Mr. HOAR. I hope we may have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to have a vote on the bill which has just been debated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be laid before the Senate. It is the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the vote may be taken upon the amendment proposed to the bill which was just under consideration.

Mr. COKE. I shall object, because I have an amendment that I desire to present, and I wish to make some remarks upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas objects, and the unfinished business is before the Senate.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from New Hampshire has kindly consented to give way at this moment that I may ask the Senate to take up a deficiency bill. I do not think it will occupy much time.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand the Senator has the right of way for his bill, it being an appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe I have under the rule. Nevertheless I wished the consent of the Senator in charge of the unfinished business.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to be understood as giving any assent that will deprive the unfinished business of any right.

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all. I understand that.

Mr. BLAIR. It is to be resumed as soon as we get through with the deficiency bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator to yield informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks that the pending order may be laid aside informally in order that the Senate may consider a deficiency appropriation bill. If there be no objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that in the consideration of the bill the first reading may be dispensed with and that the amendments may be considered as the reading progresses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection. If not, that will be taken to be the order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Treasury Department," in line 30, to increase from $105,000 to $128,000 the appropriation "for fuel, lights, and water, required by the janitors and firemen in the proper care of the buildings, furniture, and heating apparatus, exclusive of personal services, for all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, inclusive of new buildings."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 31, to strike out the following words:

For furniture and repairs of furniture and carpets for all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $100,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For furniture and repairs of furniture and carpets for the following public buildings, namely: For post-office and subtreasury at Boston, $30,000; for custom-house at Cleveland, Ohio, $5,000; for court-house and post-office at Montgomery, Ala., $10,000; for post-office and court-house at Philadelphia, $15,000; and for custom-house and post-office at Saint Louis, Mo., $10,000; in all $70,000; and each of said amounts shall be so expended as to complete the furnishing of said buildings; and all furniture now owned by the United States in other buildings in said cities, respectively, shall be used as far as practicable, whether it corresponds with the present regulation plans for furniture or not.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 66 and 67, in the following words:

For heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus for public buildings, $16,000.

Mr. ALLISON. The items for buildings at different points named, comprising lines 49 to 67, inclusive, are not deficiencies; they are considered, however, by the committee necessary, because by making the appropriation now the buildings can be occupied sooner than they could be occupied if they were to await the annual appropriation bills. The item in lines 66 and 67, "for heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus for public buildings, $16,000," is entirely a new item, and relates to an expenditure which can just as well wait six months, or at least await the regular appropriation bill, as to be provided for now; therefore the committee, regarding this especially as not a deficiency, recommend that it be stricken out. So I will say of the custom-house and post-office at Cincinnati, where we have appropriated in this bill $100,000, it is not a deficiency, it is really an advance of the regular appropriation of next year in order to facilitate the completion of the building. I mention these facts in order that the Senate may not understand that these are pressing deficiencies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was under the head of "Interior Department," after line 71, to insert:

STATIONERY.

For stationery for the use of the Department of the Interior in wrapping and mailing the reports of the Tenth Census ordered by Congress to be distributed by this Department by the act of August 7, 1882, $5,393.18.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 80, to increase the appropriation "for incidental expenses of the several land offices" from $10,000 to $20,000.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee recommend an increase of this item for incidental expenses of the several land offices because it is necessary that the Land Office should now know what amount they can rely upon for the entire period from April 1, to July 1, as they must arrange their expenditures now for that period.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, to strike out the clause from line 98 to line 107, inclusive, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to transfer from appropriations for the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum for the fiscal year 1884 any unexpended balances and apply the same to purposes for which the appropriations for said institution for the current fiscal year are exhausted; but the aggregate amount appropriated for the expenses of the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum for the fiscal year 1884 shall not be exceeded because of the transfer herein authorized.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to transfer the sum of $1,000 from the appropriation for clothing, bedding, forage, and transportation for the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum for the fiscal year 1884, and apply said sum as follows: $600 to repairs and furniture and $400 to fuel and lights for said hospital for said fiscal year; but the aggregate amount appropriated for the expenses of the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum for the fiscal year 1884 shall not be exceeded because of the transfer herein authorized. And the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized to settle and allow, if found correct, the accounts of the disbursing officers of the Interior Department for payments to clerks, watchmen, laborers, and teamsters of said hospital for the fiscal years 1882, 1883, and 1884, out of the appropriations for clothing, bedding, forage, transportation, and miscellaneous expenses for said fiscal years, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 131, after the word "Office," to insert "from January 1st;" and in line 132, after the word "first," to insert "1884;" so as to make the clause read:

INDIAN OFFICE.

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the employés temporarily employed and rendering service in the Indian Office from January 1 up to and including July 1, 1884, $2,100.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 131, after the word "to," I move to strike out the words "and including;" so as to read "from January 1 up to July 1."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollars," in line 133, to strike out the following clause:

And hereafter no Department or officer of the United States shall accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law.

Mr. BECK. I desire simply to call attention to the character of legislation which sometimes creeps into bills of this sort. In an urgent deficiency bill that has been sent over to us here is a general provision that—

Hereafter no Department or officer of the United States shall accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law.

In other words, at the life-saving stations of the United States, for instance, the officers in charge, no matter what the urgency and what the emergency might be, would be prevented from using the absolutely necessary aid which is extended to them in such cases because it had not been provided for by law in a statute. So in very many other cases; and this provision is in an urgent deficiency bill in regard to which we are called upon to act promptly. So far as I was concerned, for the moment I believed it was an innocent matter, pertaining to the Indian service and limited to that, and but for the vigilance of the chairman of the committee it is likely it would have become a law without anybody observing it.

I only rose to show that we have been extremely careful in striking out matters of that general character that come to us in an apparently harmless way.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a matter of general legislation.

Mr. BECK. It is a matter of broad, general legislation, and I call attention to it to show how careful we should be not to overlook such things.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Navy Department," in the appropriations for the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, after line 141, to insert:

For contingent expenses of the bureau, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BECK. Before the bill passes I desire the chairman of the committee either to read or place upon record in some form that will reach the other House the communication made in regard to the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum, where the House made a sweeping change authorizing any appropriations to be used for any purpose and thereby depriving us of the right to know what they shall account for. To show why we limited it by the amendment we made, I should like to have that communication placed on the record in some way before the bill goes to the House.

Mr. ALLISON. It will be observed that we made a radical change in the phraseology of that provision as it came from the House. The House phraseology would authorize the substitution of any one of the items of appropriation for the Freedmen's Hospital for any other item, so that it would have made the appropriation simply a lump appropriation for any and every purpose, and they could use the appropriations for the Freedmen's Hospital for all the purposes comprised under six or seven items. As the bill came to us from the House the appropriation for any one of those items could be used for any other item. The object, however, of the paragraph was to enable the Secretary of the Interior to utilize a thousand dollars of the appropriation for bedding, &c., for the purpose of making some repairs, and also for the purpose of fuel and lights. I will put on record the letter of the Secretary of the Interior explaining this matter, and I will also put on record the letter of the Comptroller of the Treasury relating to a decision made by that officer respecting the appropriation for fuel, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the letters read?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not. I simply ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

The letters referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, March 19, 1884.

SIR: In reply to your telegram of this date I have to inform you that there will be a deficiency of $600 in the appropriation for repairs and furniture and $400 in the appropriation for fuel and lights for the Freedmen's Hospital for the present fiscal year, and an excess of $1,000 in the appropriation for clothing, bedding, forage, &c.

I also beg leave to call your attention to the inclosed copy of a decision by the First Comptroller concerning the payments of salaries to clerks, watchmen, laborers, teamsters, and laundresses, heretofore paid from the appropriation for "clothing, bedding, forage, transportation, and miscellaneous expenses." In it he decides that they are not provided for by law and can not be paid from any appropriation.

They were regularly estimated for in this and other fiscal years in the subdivision of the appropriation for "clothing, bedding, forage, transportation, and miscellaneous expenses," and the sum so estimated was allowed by Congress.

Owing to the decision of the Comptroller, no further payments can be made to the above class of employés, and all that has been paid to them during the present and past two fiscal years will be disallowed in the accounts of the disbursing clerk of this Department.

I have, therefore, to request that the item in the deficiency bill for the Freedmen's Hospital now before your committee may be so amended that suitable provision be made to pay the clerks, watchmen, laborers, teamsters, and laundresses out of the appropriation for clothing, bedding, forage, transportation, and miscellaneous expenses.

This amendment will not call for any additional appropriation.

Very respectfully,

M. L. JOSLYN, Acting Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 6, 1884.

SIR: Yours of the 4th instant, inclosing a letter from the Secretary of the Interior with regard to payment of salaries and compensation of officers and employés of the hospital for the remainder of the fiscal year, is at hand.

In it you refer to a verbal decision given by me several months ago with regard to the payment of watchmen, teamsters, laborers, clerks, and laundresses not provided for in the act of appropriation, but by your statement necessary for the support of the hospital.

At the time referred to, in conference with the Assistant Secretary of the Interior and yourself, it was understood that in order not to embarrass the operations of the hospital the laborers above mentioned should continue to be paid as formerly, but that the disallowances would stand until the sanction of Congress for the payments should be had.

In view of section 4 of the act of August 5, 1882, the payment of laborers for the fiscal year 1883 was considered as a charge against the item for salaries and compensation rather than clothing and miscellaneous expenses.

You state, however, that in accordance with the understanding above referred to the payments were made from the latter item, as has been the practice heretofore, and have also been so made during the present fiscal year. The disallowance will be changed from the item of salaries and compensation and made against the item for clothing, &c., both for the fiscal year just past and present.

I hope the hospital will be able to continue its operations until the relief desired has been given by Congress.

Very respectfully,

WM. LAWRENCE, Comptroller.
J. TARBELL, Deputy Comptroller.

C. B. PURVIS, M. D.,
Surgeon-in-Chief Freedmen's Hospital, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BECK. I did not care so much about this particular item, although it is very bad legislation in my view; but the trouble we always have in the Appropriations Committee is to confine the persons who have the power to expend the appropriations that we make to the objects for which they are given, and if this should be allowed, other things broader and more troublesome and leading to worse confusion would follow. The object I had in calling attention to it was simply to emphasize the fact that we desire the House to know and the Senate to know that as far as we can we will limit the expenditure of the money we give to the purposes for which it is given; in other words, that we will prevent the Departments and the bureaus from taking control of our legislation, and keep it in our own hands by not allowing it to become a lump sum to be used for any purpose, and this is just as good a place as any to start in making that class of legislation.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. BLAIR. Prior to proceeding to the discussion of the educational bill before the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to offer an observation in a matter that I designed to present during the morning hour. It is of public interest. I received a letter from a prominent citizen of my own State, which is the native State of Lieutenant Greely, I believe, where his family reside, in which he says that the family of Lieutenant Greely feel a strong personal interest and great anxiety for the passage of the bill introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] with reference to the offering of a reward of $25,000 for the discovery of Lieutenant Greely and his party, or in case valuable information is contributed leading to the discovery and the relief of that expedition. I will read what he says, because it is of an authentic character, and I think it ought to be considered in connection with other matters. He says:

I notice that one House or the other have instituted proceedings looking to offering a bounty to whalers who may find the Greely expedition or what remains of it.

After discussing other matters, he adds:

I can not help, however, thinking that no harm can come to the Government from offering bounties. If such discoveries are made the Government will be well paid in saving expenses of pursuing further investigation with its own fleet. If nothing is discovered then nothing is paid. I learn that the whalers start immediately, while the Government relief expedition can not start for many weeks. If indeed the Arctic voyagers are living, every month or week may diminish their chance of safety, and while I think everything should be done to relieve them, I am quite as decided that no more such expeditions should be encouraged by Congress, &c.

There is no doubt of the fact that the whalers will spread themselves all over the Arctic regions six weeks or two months earlier than the Government expedition can find that locality. I deem the suggestion of importance, and I will pass the letter to the Senator who introduced the bill or to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs at a later time.

F. PROSH AND T. F. M'ELROY.

Mr. DOLPH. I am informed that this morning the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] reported adversely from the Committee on Territories the bill (S. 954) for the relief of F. Prosh and T. F. McElroy, and it was postponed indefinitely. I desire to have the bill placed upon the Calendar under the rules. I was not in when the report was made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon requests that the vote by which the bill indicated by him was postponed indefinitely may be reconsidered, and that the bill be placed on the Calendar. If there is no objection that order will be made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present the petition of Rev. Samuel G. Willard and 34 other citizens of Connecticut, praying national aid for the common schools of the States and Territories on the basis of illiteracy. As the petition relates to a pending question, I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a petition of the Sons of Temperance of Connecticut, officially signed, representing 2,200 members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BECK. I present a petition, which I have received since that order was called this morning, signed by the Rev. W. F. V. Bartlett and a number of leading lawyers and men interested in education in the city of Lexington, Ky., praying for the passage of the bill now before the Senate, or some bill of that character, for reasons set forth in the petition. The petition may be laid on the table, as the bill is now before the Senate, or it may be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, if the Senator from New Hampshire prefers.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose, as the bill is pending, the petition should lie on the table. I think that is the usual disposition in such cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. GARLAND presented the petition of S. S. Shedd, president, and T. Fritz, secretary, and a committee representing the Master Plumbers' Association of the District of Columbia, praying for such legislation as will carry into effect the act of Congress giving the commissioners of the District of Columbia authority to make certain rules and regulations governing plumbing and house drainage; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying that the tract known as the Oklahoma lands, in the Indian Territory, may be thrown open to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented the petition of John C. Welch, praying for the purchase by Congress of copies of his condensed statement of the Compendium of the Tenth Census; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1335) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of the late John V. B. Bleeker, a paymaster in the Navy, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1899) granting an increase of pension to James M. Blades; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1900) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary M. Ord; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say for the benefit of the committee which will have charge of the bill that the lady for whom I introduce the bill is the widow of General Ord, and is in very indigent circumstances. He was a very brave man and did great service for the country, and I hope the committee will report the bill as soon as they can possibly do so. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. SABIN], who is necessarily absent from the Senate this morning, I ask leave at this time to introduce a bill.

The bill (S. 1901) for the relief of William H. Whiting was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 1902) for the erection of a public building at Staunton, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 1903) to amend "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at the most accessible point within five miles above the city of Saint Charles, Mo.," approved April 14, 1882; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 1904) for the benefit of Saint Augustine church, of Saint Augustine, Fla.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 1905) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to reimburse certain funds and to sell certain lands belonging to the North Carolina Cherokees, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1906) to investigate the issue of fraudulent land-warrants and to protect soldiers and sailors of the United States from loss therefrom; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1907) for the relief of John N. Trook, administrator of William Hughes, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1908) for the relief of Henry Martin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That Priscilla A. Burwell have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers in respect to her claim upon the condition imposed by the rules.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 1692) to limit the cost of indexing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON to the amendment of Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. BLAIR. I send to the desk a proposed amendment to section 8, which I ask may be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. HARRIS in the chair]. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 8 by adding at the close of the section the following:

And unless the annual report of the State and Territorial authorities to the Secretary of the Interior herein required to be made shall show the expenditure during the year of such amount from the revenues of the State derived from State and local taxation and from income of permanent school funds, if any there be, or other source of revenue within the State, then no part of its allotment for the year ensuing shall be paid to such State or Territory, unless on appeal to Congress it shall be otherwise provided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment not being in order at this time, it will lie on the table.

Mr. BLAIR. I offer it at this time as an amendment to section 8, leaving the section to remain as it now is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment already pending.

Mr. BLAIR. I say I offer it for information at this time that the Senate may understand that if the pending amendment does not prevail I shall move this amendment, which I think will remove all difficulties in the mind of any one whatever as to the meaning of the section. I ask that the pending amendment may be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] now pending to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 8, line 6, after the word "provided," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section and to insert:

That no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

Mr. BLAIR. It has been suggested in the course of the debate that there are many States which already know enough, and that there is no occasion for the expenditure of increased revenues within those States for the cause of education; at all events, that certain of the States will not feel inclined to receive from the General Government whatever share might fall to them in a division of $15,000,000 or any other sum, upon the basis of illiteracy or upon any other basis. Should that be the case, there is nothing in the laws or the Constitution of the land or of any State to compel them to receive it, and they can by an act of their Legislatures or other proper authorities decline so to do, and they will have the right to designate the manner in which the sum which would fall to them should be appropriated. They can turn it over to the general fund; they can decline to receive it; or they can indicate the way in which they would be glad to have it applied under the provisions of the bill. So this difficulty, which we could not well avoid raising, if there are such States, could be obviated by the action of the States themselves. Any system of distribution which we might adopt would, it seems to me, in order to avoid just objection, if anybody chose to raise the objection and should not waive that objection, necessarily be uniform and carry some money to all portions of the country. If, then, some localities in the country which would receive a portion of it decline to receive it, waive their right to it, it can not be urged as an objection to the bill that the tender was made. Without such tender in the general law it seems to me there might be just objection to the bill.

The amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana proposes that in each State there shall be an expenditure derived from the revenues of the State itself equal to the amount that is received by it under the provisions of the bill each year, not including in the expenditure by the State the amount paid out by the State for school-houses. Now, I would ask the attention of the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has not properly understood the effect of my amendment. The amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] would have prevented any State from receiving any portion of the sum appropriated by this bill unless the annual expenditure by the State out of its own revenues was equal to the amount to which the State would be entitled under this bill. My amendment allows the State to receive an equal amount under this bill—an amount equal to the amount that it shall spend from its own revenue. In other words, if the allotment to Louisiana under this bill for this year was three-quarters of a million, $750,000, the amendment of the Senator from Kansas would prevent that State receiving anything unless the State should spend $750,000 from its own revenue; but under my amendment if the State should spend $200,000 from its own revenue it would get $200,000 under this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Two hundred thousand dollars, does the Senator mean, without reference to the expenditure for school-houses?

Mr. HARRISON. Without reference to the expenditure for school-houses. That is provided for. If the State should spend in education the current expenses of the year, in paying teachers, &c., $200,000, it would get $200,000 under this bill according to the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. So far as that goes, then, the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana would be less hurtful and less objectionable than the original amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas. But as bearing on this effort to modify seriously the nature of the bill itself, I call the attention of the Senate to the matter to be found in tables 20 and 21 in the RECORD of March 19, which relate to the number of unenrolled pupils or students in the country. The unenrolled are necessarily those who attend school nowhere. Everywhere it is admitted as a matter of discussion among educators that there are in this country sittings or school-house accommodations of any kind hardly equal to the number of those who are actually enrolled; so that when the Senate come to consider the statistics of the unenrolled children of the country they are considering the numbers for whom there is no provision whatever made now in the way of school-houses, teachers, books, or school accommodations. The figures to be found in these tables do not include those who receive instruction in private or parochial schools; in other words, they represent the numbers that attend no form of instruction whatever.

In the whole country there are children of the school ages not enrolled; and the school ages vary, as has already been explained, in the various States; in some from 5 to 15; in others from 4 to 21; in many States not including large numbers who actually attend school, and in other States where the ages are from 4 to 21, undoubtedly including many who would not under any circumstances attend school—within the school ages there is in the whole country an aggregate of 6,030,936 who are without any school accommodations, not enrolled, attending nowhere.

Now, assume that a school-house will accomodate fifty scholars, that the common-school houses of the country should be so constructed as to accommodate fifty scholars, and there will be required for this number of unenrolled scholars 120,567 school-houses now not existing at all, and for which no provision is as yet made by taxation or otherwise. Of course the same number of teachers at least will be required. It is generally, I believe, conceded that one teacher can not properly instruct more than about thirty scholars. Common-school teachers as a rule perhaps are obliged to take care of a larger number. Assume that each teacher is sufficient for each school of the number that I mention, fifty; then there must be as many teachers as houses, that is 120,567. Doubtless there should be a larger number.

The average cost of a school-house, any sort of a school-house throughout the country for the accommodation of fifty scholars, would not be less than $300. It would really be a much larger sum; but assume it to be $300. Then it will require to supply the unenrolled children of the whole country $36,170,100 simply for school-houses alone, taking the entire country north and south. Suppose now that this new number of teachers necessary for the additional school-houses which are to be provided and to be qualified in some way expend, or that the public expend for them upon their education one year's time and $250 in money, which is certainly a very moderate expenditure, and you have then in fitting this number of teachers for their work an expense of $10,854,930.

A very low estimate of the cost of text-books has been prepared also by request, and the cost of text-books to supply those scholars for those schools that do not now exist would be $180,782. Adding the cost of school-houses, the expenses of preparation of teachers, the pay of teachers, and the cost of school-books, so as to cover a three-months' school for the first year, there would be for the entire country an expenditure for its unenrolled and unprovided-for children of $77,347,662. These calculations have reference to the entire country. They do not include the deficient means for the education of those actually enrolled. Other data have already been cited in reference to that on a previous occasion.

Take now table 21, which relates to the Southern States and embraces the same particulars in the Southern States that I have stated in reference to the country at large. Senators will observe that table 21 enumerates the same States, but in the figures the Northern States are all omitted, so that the aggregate at the close of the table embraces nothing but the data from the Southern States. The number of unenrolled scholars in the Southern States, comprising about one-third of the actual population of the country, is 2,873,399, nearly 3,000,000 as the Senate will observe, while the total number for the whole country is 6,030,936. Practically in round numbers one-half the unenrolled children of the country are in the Southern States, where only one-third of the population is to be found. To provide for these children in the Southern States there would be necessary 57,465 school-houses; and speaking of this item of school-houses, it is of course well known that in the Southern States the provision in this regard is far less substantial than it is in the Northern States; there are comparatively very few school-houses and such as there are are of the cheaper and more temporary sort. To a great extent at least that is true.

Mr. FRYE. What is the average value of the school-houses in North Carolina?

Mr. BLAIR. I have seen it stated that it was not over $25; I have seen it stated that it was not over $50 at the outside. I can not say in regard to that. They have some good school-houses. The climate is comparatively mild, as we know. They have some very good school-houses. In some cases they have appropriated public buildings, that were occupied for other purposes before the war; but the great mass of the people are necessarily unprovided with school-houses, because it is only recently that the school system has been known there. Under what were called the carpet-bag State governments was established for the first time in the constitutions of the Southern States a common-school system. It has lived among great difficulties, as we all know, ever since, and the heavy investment necessary to begin with in the construction of school-houses has very seldom been made. Accommodations in various kinds of buildings, in private dwellings, in vestries of churches, and in various ways of a temporary character such as would answer temporarily the purpose desired, have been adopted all over North Carolina as well as in the South generally. But of course it is necessary, if the system is to stand, that there shall be school-houses in the South as well as in the North, and they can only be constructed by the means derived from taxation—taxation for school purposes. And that taxation, this bill provides, must come from the States themselves. This bill explicitly requires that no portion of the funds which are to come from the National Government shall be expended in school structures. It has been thought by the committee, and it is the request of the educators who have been heard by the committee from the South as well as throughout the country generally, that there should be no national expenditure for places wherein to hold the schools. Where they needed the schools themselves they would hold them out of doors under trees, in barns, sheds, vestries, &c.; they would have the schools, and get the school-houses as rapidly as they possibly could. We have thought it would be well that there should be some freedom of action on the part of the State authorities with regard to this matter of school structures.

As I was saying, it is necessary that there should be school accommodations or sittings, school-buildings of some kind to the number of 57,465 to accommodate the unenrolled children of the Southern States. The cost of these buildings, assuming it to be $300 apiece, would be $17,239,500. The cost of qualifying teachers would be $14,366,250, or a larger sum than all the seventeen Southern States, including the District of Columbia, are now able to expend for educational purposes of every kind—the construction of houses, providing the teachers, paying the teachers, and the qualification of teachers. The cost of teachers' wages for a three-months' school in each year would be $5,172,750. The cost of books for pupils in those States would be $86,148. These items give a total of $36,864,648, which it would be necessary to expend immediately in the Southern States in order to give this class the accommodations for those children whose names are not found upon any school register at the present time, that is to say, for those never yet inside of a school-house, a private school or a public school.

I state these matters in order to emphasize, or at all events to bring sharply before the Senate, an idea of the amount of actual expenditure not ordinarily taken into account which must be made in the Southern States particularly, and in fact in all the States of the country, in order that our unenrolled children may be properly provided for. In view of these figures showing that more than three times the amount which would go into the Southern States is to-day necessary to be expended in order to provide schools for the first three months for those children in the Southern States who now have no educational privileges whatever, it seems to me that the ten or eleven million dollars which this bill appropriates to be expended in that portion of our country is very trifling indeed, and that any effort to modify the bill in such a way as to lessen the amount they shall receive ought certainly to be resisted by the Senate.

Now I wish to say a few words bearing upon the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, and I should be glad to have his attention for a moment, because what I have to say now relates to the removal of the difficulty which he finds with the bill. He has proposed an amendment to section 8; that is the section which, after the recitation of what I suppose the Senator looks upon more as a stump speech than anything else, but which I thought necessary to be put there as indicating the purpose of the bill not to be to fasten permanently the idea of Federal aid upon the school system of the country, goes on to say:

That no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof, and during the second five years of its operation a sum at least equal to the whole amount it shall be entitled to receive under this act.

I have added, or propose, if the Senate see fit to adopt it, to add, to that section the amendment which was read just now for information, which provides that the annual report required by previous sections of the bill, which must be made before the close of each fiscal year, from each State and Territory of the manner in which the allotment of that year has been expended, must show that during the year of the expenditure of that allotment the State from its own revenues has already expended one-third of the amount at least that it has received from the General Government; and unless the report shows that fact, then it becomes the duty of the General Government under other sections of the bill to withhold from such State any allotment whatever for the year ensuing.

Senators will see that a bill which we pass to-day can have in no wise operated upon the States in their action previous to the passage of the bill. Whether they were to receive or were not to receive conditionally anything from the Government of the United States would not have influenced their action in the year preceding the passage of the bill, because there would have been no such action, and it is fair to assume that without power there is no effort. At the commencement of the year, unless this bill becomes operative during the present session, there is a year's time lost to the country, to the children of the country, and certainly this nation can not afford to lose the benefits of this increase in the school funds for her children for a whole year. Therefore the bill should be so framed that this allotment to the various States shall be available forthwith.

The system of supervision, if you please to so call it, is one which depends upon the reports which the States may make of what they have done. We, on the theory of this bill as of former educational bills passed in this body, give this money year by year to the State, and hold the State to a rigid accountability for good faith and for good sense in the distribution and use of the funds, and require within the same year a report to the General Government of what they have done with it. Of course they can do nothing with it unless they already have it; and it is absurd that the bill should require a report of that which has not previously passed into the possession of the State. All subsequent action after the second year or third or fourth or fifth and so on up to the tenth year, year by year depends on the action of the State as to what it has already received. Therefore the bill in other sections having provided for the distribution to the States and the report to the Secretary of the Interior before the close of the fiscal year, requires also compliance with certain other conditions specified in the bill as to the manner of the actual use of the money and one of the principal conditions, the principal condition if you choose so to consider it, but at all events one of the principal conditions required by the bill is that the State shall have expended of its own revenues during that year a sum not less than one-third of what the State has received from the General Government, and so on for five years; and if that condition is not complied with and is not shown to have been complied with by this report, what remedy have we? That money in some States may have been partially or wholly misapplied; we can not help that; we have got to run the risk of that. What is the guarantee? What is our remedy? We refuse any expenditure under the allotment to the State for the future until the deficiency is made up, as other sections of the bill show.

The meaning must be apparent to any one who examines all the provisions of this bill carefully and who will remember, as it is only fair to remember, with reference to this bill as we are obliged to do with reference to every other bill that ever came before Congress, that there is no bill entirely to be found in a single section or a single line. If that were so, the bill might be made correspondingly short. It is not possible in each section to enumerate substantially all else that there is in the bill. If that were so we must construct our bills on the principle of the old poem of The House that Jack Built. This is a bill; this is a bill for the establishment of common schools; this is a bill for the establishment and temporary support of common schools; this is a bill by which it is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, going on and reciting the first section, and so make it up section after section by a sort of conglomeration of poems of the description of The House that Jack Built. It is only good sense and fair treatment to construe one provision of this bill by other provisions of the bill; and if Senators will take the pains to do it, and will assume that it is possible that a bill which has been examined by others aside from the members of the Committee on Education and Labor, if they are supposed to be entirely incompetent to draft legislation, is so drawn that what is lacking in one section is to be found in another, and that there is some thought at the basis of the entire system which is to be found in this bill, I think they will come to the conclusion that on the whole it is a tolerably well-digested and a tolerably well-expressed bill to attain the purpose that is designed. Whether that purpose is one to be desired is another thing, of course. I only ask Senators to construe the bill as they would bills from the Judiciary Committee or bills from the Committee on Finance or from the Committee on Territories, or from any other of those committees that are confessedly competent to draft legislation and report it to the Senate.

I come now to the objections raised by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. The Senator from Iowa says that he objects to the whole theory of the bill in this, that you should begin with a small sum and gradually increase. That is the inevitable tendency, he says. It is undoubtedly so as far as the expenditures of the General Government are concerned in the bureaus that are to be permanently in charge of the General Government. He cites the establishment of the Bureau of Education. Three thousand dollars was the first year's appropriation and a single man was employed. He made a preliminary examination and he made a most valuable report. Then the institution went into practical operation, and it commenced its great work, and now I believe the annual expenditure is about $60,000, and the Senator observed that the bureau is constantly asking for more. That is undoubtedly so, and it is constantly pinched in its legitimate and its proper and most useful operations, more so I believe than any other bureau of corresponding importance under the charge of the Government.

But, Mr. President, the theory of this bill has not been that common-school education was to become and to remain permanently the business of the General Government. I am very strongly opposed to any such result. I would not like the bill to pass at all if I supposed that the result would be to ingraft upon the General Government the maintenance and permanent support of the common-school system of the country at large. And therefore the bill provides that the largest sum be applied now when the greatest emergency exists, and it goes upon the theory that as time goes on and the States are stimulated to greater action and the expenditure of the money furnished by the General Government has its due effect, the necessity of our aid will decrease, for in ten years, bear in mind, we shall practically educate two generations so far as common-school education is concerned, because most scholars get their common-school education in five years, that which is most essential to them. The result will be, I assume, a gradually increasing degree of intelligence among the States themselves and a corresponding disposition to support their own schools, and the assistance of the Federal Government will be gradually eliminated; little by little it will disappear, and as it disappears gradually, so gradually on the other hand will the local communities rise to a full apprehension of the dignity and importance of the work committed to them of educating their own children and maintaining their own corresponding elevated status and condition.

That is the theory of the bill; and now the Senator will see that if this bill were constructed upon the opposite theory, almost as a matter of necessity the result would be the fastening of the common-school system upon the country at large. I do not think that he designs to do that. See how it would operate. Suppose you commence in this case with a small contribution to a State; instead of giving a million to a State which needs it, we give her $100,000. Suppose we do that and we require of her a contribution of $100,000; it runs year after year to half a million and she gets up to that point. The thing goes on pari passu between the State and the Federal Government. As she pays we increase as he suggests, and by and by we find a State that is like New York, requiring an expenditure of $10,000,000 a year. The Federal Government gives $5,000,000; the State taxes herself to the extent of $5,000,000 more; and the common schools are just as much dependent upon one as the other. We will assume—we are assuming now—that there is no tendency to shelve the entire expense upon the Federal Government, which would be the case unquestionably; we assume that the State keeps up her end of the yoke, to use a common expression. It goes on in this way. Is there ever any stopping place? Is not the necessity of national support increasing year by year? So by and by you find the nation contributing $100,000,000 to the support of the school system of the country and the States expending a corresponding sum. Evidently we must go on forever or we must stop, for this is one of the difficulties which grow worse as they go on. It is never cured by acting upon a theory of the kind which the Senator advances.

Now, suppose that, having reached this point where the schools are practically or very largely dependent on the National Government, we withdraw our aid at once, where is the school system? Utterly prostrated, of course, because one-half of what is necessary for its maintenance is withdrawn at once, and the system is utterly ruined. That I think the Senator will admit to be only the logical outcome of the position which he has suggested. I do not understand that he did more than suggest it. I did not understand that it was a position which he proposed to insist upon, but it was one that occurred to him and one that has occurred to myself before and been considered; and therefore this scale sliding down, it seems to me, is a very important feature in this bill.

Suppose that it operates according to the provisions of the bill as it now stands, at the end of ten years the last appropriation would be $6,000,000. That would be distributed, of course, throughout the country. Meanwhile the country would have very largely increased in wealth, in population, and in general intelligence, and local contributions to the support of the schools in local communities would have correspondingly increased, and the withdrawal of this $6,000,000 would not occasion any shock at all. But if it should, here is another bill which the Senate has sanctioned several times, which proposes to set apart a certain source of income from the Government, the receipts from public lands and one-half the income derived annually from the land-grant railroads, so called, the interest on which accumulating year by year shall be distributed throughout the country. That, of course, gives at the present time nothing whatever. The interest for the first year on so small an amount would not be perceptible. It might lengthen the schools a day or two, not more than that; but it would be a constantly increasing fund and the interest would be constantly increasing the fund, and at the end of ten years there would be probably four or five million dollars derivable from that source which distributed in accordance with the provisions of that bill, which I hope will hereafter be adopted by the Senate, would come in to save any shock, if any shock there were, likely to be occasioned by the withdrawal of this contribution for temporary aid. The accumulations from that fund could never be looked upon as in any sense whatever dangerous in the great future to the common-school system of the States, because it would be of so trifling an amount that it could never be relied upon to any serious extent; and yet it would I say, at the end of the ten years, if there were any complaint of the withdrawal of the aid of the General Government under this bill, suffice to prevent any shock whatever.

Mr. President, it has been repeatedly urged as an objection to this bill that the States can not expend this money profitably. Well, I admit that at first sight there would be great force in that objection, but when we come to consider the real condition, the real facts in the case, I think Senators will concede that it is without force. I have already shown the extent of school accommodations and school privileges as they exist in the country at large. I confine what I now say to the Southern States, because the objection is made principally that the Southern States, not being well accustomed to the practical operation of school systems, are the most likely to waste these funds if they receive them in large amounts. In the Southern States they now expend some thirteen and a half or fourteen million dollars, the great mass of it being expended for wages of teachers, and in so doing they are able to secure schools for only about the average of three months per year. In many portions of the Southern States, I am sorry to say—yet it is a fact and the truth will bear its own weight and is necessary in order that we may apply the proper remedy—these schools are open not more than four or five weeks in the year. Yet what have we? I am not now dealing with the unenrolled, the unprovided-for that I mentioned in the first part of my remarks this afternoon. I am dealing with the schools as they exist, with the enrolled scholars, with the school houses and teachers, with the school plant that now actually exists in the Southern States where they spend this thirteen or fourteen million dollars, and yet have schools not averaging over three months in the year. What is necessary to give them six or eight or nine months' schooling in the year the same as we have in the cities and in the rural districts generally at the North? Nothing except an addition to the wages of the teachers; and every cent of this ten million dollars which goes to the Southern States could be expended simply in prolonging the existence of the existing agencies and giving to the agencies now alive in the Southern States anything like a corresponding season of activity with like agencies that we have the benefit of in the North at the present time. So there is no chance to waste this money unless there is a disposition to do so, unless there is a determination to do so, to take it by fraud or wrong. Nothing need be done but simply prolong these schools, paying the same teachers they now have, and giving them the same rate of wages they now receive, and instructing the same scholars they now have.

But, Mr. President, I do not suppose that this fund going to the Southern States would be made use of wholly to prolong existing schools. I do not anticipate that this sum of money going to the Southern States would prolong existing schools more than four and a half or possibly five months in the year, and it ought not to, because here are children unprovided for.

We require the States to provides the school-houses. We allow not exceeding one-tenth of the fund to be applied to the qualification of teachers, who are the indispensable, primal necessity to the existence of a school. If you have the teacher and the scholar you will have the school, because if the teacher understands his business he can give instruction without a text-book, and they will find somewhere that they can hold their convocations. Therefore, not exceeding one-tenth of this amount, or not exceeding $1,000,000, may be made available for the establishment of normal schools, for the holding of teachers' institutes, for the training and qualifiation of teachers either by temporary or by permanent means. That will take one million out for the qualification of teachers. Then for the establishment and instruction of schools for the unenrolled, it will be readily seen that a very large proportion, in fact two or three times the whole amount of this appropriation, would be absorbed in the proper supply of the want.

Mr. President, I do not know that I need to say anything else on the pending amendment. I look upon the vote that may be taken on these amendments as vital to the bill. I think that the adoption of these amendments—while any amount of money will do good—would interfere very seriously with the true theory upon which we ought to give if we give at all, that practically the bill would be extremely injured, and I should regret exceedingly that the Senate should adopt either the amendment to the amendment or the amendment itself. If it be rejected, I shall ask the Senate then to adopt the amendment which I have sent to the desk and which has been read for information, and which I think will remove the trouble.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire has furnished in the amendment which he has had read for information any substitute for the uncertainty of the eighth section as it stands. In my judgment the amendment which the Senator now proposes only adds confusion to a section that was confused before. It seems to be an attempt to remove the objections which were pointed out to section 8 yesterday by several Senators, and which I understand were confessed by the Senator from New Hampshire by putting in another provision that expressly declares another basis of distribution.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator entirely misapprehends. The section is clear and explicit, conveys precisely the meaning that the committee designed it should, and taken in connection with other sections of the bill is easily understood. I propose to add the amendment simply for the purpose of making entirely clear in that same section precisely what is meant.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not content where we see a difficulty in the phraseology of a particular section to accept this general reference which the Senator is constantly making to other provisions of the bill. That is too general. If there is any specific provision elsewhere in the bill that makes certain that which is clearly uncertain in section 8 we ought to have our attention called to it; for while I will yield to no one in my general deference to the Committee on Education, and especially to the chairman of the Committee, yet when we come here as Senators to pass upon a bill so important as this, appropriating so much money as is given by this bill, we must act upon our own judgment as to the meaning of the language used.

Mr. BLAIR. Well, will the Senator allow me to refer him—I do not wish to interrupt his speech——

Mr. HARRISON. I scarcely claim to be making a speech at all, and it will not be an interruption for the Senator to call my attention to any other part of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I will then call the Senator's attention to the thirteenth section of the bill, which provides:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall receive from the governor of each State and Territory a report, to be made by or through such governor, on or before the 30th day of June of each year, giving a detailed account of the payments or disbursements made of the school fund apportioned to his State or Territory, &c.

And one of these conditions in section 8 is that they shall have expended at least one-third of the amount they receive from the General Government. If that report fails to show that fact, then the bill expressly provides, and in this same section, that no more money shall be paid over to the State. I tried to explain to the Senate how impossible it was to provide any test as to the paying over of the money based upon the action of the preceding year. I will ask him while I am on my feet where the language of section 8 is which provides that this money shall not be paid out in the State unless the conditions have been complied with?

Mr. HARRISON. Now, Mr. President, what has the Senator from New Hampshire done? He has only called my attention to a provision in this bill that has been mentioned a score of times by him and that has been noticed by every Senator on this floor. What is it? Simply that a report is called for by the bill from the State authorities as to what they have done with this money and how much of their own money they have expended. I would like the Senator to tell me what light that throws upon the phraseology used in section 8, what connection it has with it? Now, as the section stands—and I understood the Senator from New Hampshire yesterday to agree that the criticism first made by the Senator from Kansas who sits next him [Mr. INGALLS] and afterward by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] was well taken, and I am clear that it is myself—the provision is:

That no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend——

Mr. HOAR. Read the rest of it.

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to read all of it if the Senator from Massachusetts will give me time—annually expend for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof——

Mr. BLAIR. Now read the formal amendment in connection with it.

Mr. HARRISON. I will come to that presently. I will not have it read now. I am going to discuss it presently—and during the second five years of its operation a sum at least equal to the whole amount it shall be entitled to receive under this act.

Of course the Senator understands the terms "annually" and "annually during the second five years of its operation."

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know whether we should be authorized to put in the word "annually" there or not; but if that be so, how can you tell what the State has expended for five years until the end of the five years?

Mr. BLAIR. Can not you tell what it expends annually when it makes an annual report?

Mr. HARRISON. I can tell what it has spent annually, but until the end of five years it can not be told what it has spent annually for five years.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, well; that is the merest carping criticism in the world, it seems to me. Here is a provision requiring that during a certain series of years an annual report shall be made showing what is expended each year for five years, and during that period of time one-third of the amount received from the Government must be expended by the State; during the second five of the ten years an annual report is required also, and it is required then that during that time the State shall have used as much each year as it shall have received from the General Government. It is impossible to mystify that matter.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is right in saying that an annual report is required, but until you have had five annual reports how can the Government know that you have spent annually for five years a given sum?

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, well; I do not understand the Senator. I would like to have him take two or three days to explain that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator yesterday, if I am not mistaken, when the Senator from Arkansas gave his authority for this criticism, which I was just repeating this morning, and that is all, certainly said that he himself saw the difficulty, and consented to an amendment, and now he proposes to leave it in the bill. I do not care to discuss with him the question as to which of us it is that is obtuse in this discussion; but this section requires that unless these States shall have expended one-third annually of the sum appropriated for a period of five years they shall not get anything. Language can not be plainer than that. You must have the five reports before they have laid the basis of a claim for this appropriation. Well, now, what does the Senator propose? Instead of making that clear, instead of changing that phraseology so as to make it clear that he means that they shall have their allotment each year if they have spent in that year one-third of the amount which they are entitled to under this bill, he proposes an amendment to which I ask the attention of the Senate, to see whether I am not right in saying that it simply adds to the confusion. The proposition is, if I am right, that there are to be five annual reports, because prior to that nobody can know that for five years they have paid out this sum that is required. Now he proposes to add:

> And unless the report of the State and Territorial authorities to the Secretary of the Treasury herein required to be made shall show the expenditure during the year of such amount from the revenues of the State derived from State and local taxation and from the income of permanent school funds, if any there be, or other sources of revenue within the State, then no part of its allotment shall for the ensuing year be paid to such State or Territory, unless on appeal to Congress it shall be otherwise provided.

Here is another proposition totally in conflict with the one I have already been discussing; that is, that they shall receive their allotment provided that for the current year they appropriate an amount equal to one-third of it out of their own revenue, and if they fail to do that they shall forfeit the allotment for the next year. It does not need any argument to show that that scheme is entirely at variance with the scheme which is disclosed in the previous part of this section. If this is the basis on which the Senator wants to put it, instead of adding it here it ought to be incorporated in place of the phrase upon which I have been commenting. It simply confuses the section by putting in as a proviso that which is inconsistent with the body of the section and substitutes a new scheme for it altogether.

I am not disposed to be hypercritical, but it does seem to me that this section should be put in such a shape that we shall not need to place a proviso at the end of it in order to understand what it means. If this is the scheme which the Senator proposes let it go into the body of the section, and let us strike out all this about the five years. What are you to do? What place does all this provision about five years discharge here?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will excuse me. He can not be in earnest in asking a question like that. What does the section say? It prescribes the amount which each State is conditioned to pay in order to receive anything whatever from the nation at large during the first five years—that is the object of the section—and the amount it is to receive during the second five years requiring it to raise as much as it receives from the National Government. That is the purpose of the section, and this that I propose to add was utterly unnecessary. It is all in the provision that the first division shall be upon the basis of illiteracy to the States; and, second, in the requirement of a report at the end of each year of what they have done with it, and a provision that they shall forfeit what they would receive in case the conditions are not complied with, of which conditions this condition in section 8 is one, and one of the most important. Yielding to the ideas of some Senators that it might be made more explicit, I prepared this amendment proposing practically to put other sections of the bill right in here, so that this fault might be removed, if it is a fault. I showed it to my friend the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], and he read it and he found no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that it met every difficulty completely.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I can allow the Senator from New Hampshire to differ with me as to the weight of the suggestions which I may make, but I can not allow him to question my sincerity and earnestness in making them.

Mr. BLAIR. If I dropped an expression that seemed to do that, I withdraw it. I meant nothing of the kind. I believe in the integrity, the honor, and the Senatorial capacity and genius of the Senator from Indiana as strongly as I do in any one's.

Mr. HARRISON. I feel fully indorsed and re-established in the confidence of the Senator, and I will proceed with the word or two more I have to say.

Let me call attention now to an expression in this proposed amendment. I am sorry that the Senator yielded so far as to propose something which he says himself in his last speech is utterly unnecessary, because I am sure that every unnecessary word that he introduces here will only add confusion. When you have enough words to express the thought every additional word is in the way.

Now, the Senator says, "shall show the expenditure during the year of such amount"—that is the way it reads—"such amount." What does he mean?

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator puts a question like that to me, I invite him to answer his own question by reading the section that that is a portion of. The amount is prescribed in an earlier sentence.

Mr. HARRISON. There are two modes prescribed. For five years there is one-third and for the other years there is a sum equal to the amount appropriated.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will not find any difficulty in the grammatical construction, even if that is precisely as he says.

Mr. HARRISON. I only rose to say that it seems to me this proposed amendment furnishes no reason for voting down mine, and, according to the confession of the Senator who proposes it, it introduces nothing new; it is unnecessary.

The object of my amendment was to take, as we must do, the preceding year as the basis for distribution. We can not take this year in which we are to make the appropriation, because we can not know what the States have done until the year is ended. Therefore I take the preceding year as the basis, and I give them such an amount, not exceeding of course their entire quota, as they have themselves spent, and then taking each preceding year during the whole period, not dividing it into periods of five years as this does, but taking for the whole period the basis of their expenditure the preceding year, we give them so much as they have spent, provided it does not exceed the entire allotment to the State. That is the idea of my amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that as the bill is now drawn the Senator from New Hampshire has very clearly provided in the eighth section that no money shall be paid out under the bill until the expiration of ten years.

Mr. HARRISON. Five years.

Mr. HOAR. No; ten years.

Mr. HARRISON. I guess the Senator is right about that.

Mr. HOAR. Let me repeat. I am stating my views and those of no other person as far as I know. The Senator from New Hampshire seems to me to have clearly provided by the eighth section of his bill—it may be that there is something in some other section of it in conflict with it that the court or the Department might construe the two together and make sense of the two—that no money shall be paid out under this bill until the end of ten years. See how it is. No part of the money appropriated shall be paid in any State which during the first five years shall not annually expend a certain sum. How can you tell whether that annual expenditure has taken place until the end of the five years, and not a dollar is to go out of the Treasury until that has been ascertained?

> And during the second five years of its operation a sum at least equal to the whole amount it shall be entitled to receive under this act.

And no man is to know whether the State has annually paid out during those second five years this sum equal to what it gets from the Treasury until those five years are all over. It does not say that no money is to be paid out until for the next preceding year such proportion of annual payment shall have been shown. My friend from Indiana will see that I am right. It does not come until the end of ten years under the bill.

There is nothing which I think my friend from New Hampshire need be concerned about in this criticism. I profess to have some little experience as a lawyer, and twenty times in my life and more I have drawn bills which on putting different parts of them together I found contained such inconsistencies. It happens every day in the Judiciary Committee when it meets to consider bills before that committee, with so many learned and experienced lawyers and legislators; there is hardly a meeting when something of this kind does not come up. I should be very much surprised if the most experienced and capable Senator in this body were to report a bill of twenty sections to the Senate containing a new and complicated system that he should not get into it by a failure to put two parts of the bill together in his own mind as it changes and grows and is molded under his hand some little inconsistency of this kind; and I beg my friend from New Hampshire not to suppose that there is any disrespect to him intended by the criticism.

It does not seem to me that it is fair to meet that difficulty in the bill by the amendment which is proposed by my honorable friend from Indiana, because he not only makes the necessary verbal amendment to make the section convey the meaning which was intended by the author of the bill, but he couples with that an amendment to the principle of the bill. The Senator from New Hampshire wants only to compel the State to pay a sum equal to a certain proportion of what it is to receive from the General Government, while the amendment compels it to pay a sum equal to all that is received from the General Government in the preceding year. Now, it seems to me that it is just to the committee and the author of this bill to permit an amendment to be made which shall express his meaning, which everybody, I trust, will agree to, and then take the sense of the Senate separately on the other proposition where the parties differ.

Now, Mr. President, I make this suggestion, which I hope will meet everybody's assent, so as to make the bill mean just what the Senator from New Hampshire thinks it means, and prevent its containing an error which will prevent me, one of its most ardent friends, from voting for it if it stands as it is now. I suggest that the Senator from Indiana consent to let the Senate make this amendment before taking the vote on his; that is, after the words "which shall not," following the word "Territory," in line 8, these words shall be inserted:

Each preceding year have complied so far with the conditions hereof as is required for that year.

Then a period; and then begin a sentence—

Each State shall during the first five years, &c.

Then the Senator from Indiana can propose to affix his condition if he pleases. That will make the section read in this way:

It is hereby provided that no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not each preceding year have complied so far with the conditions hereof as is required for that year. Each State shall during the first five years annually expend, &c.

I ask that the sense of the Senate be taken on that amendment if the Senator from Indiana will permit.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire will allow the Chair to state the proposition now made. The Senator from Massachusetts, as the Chair understands, asks unanimous consent to propose an amendment at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. As the Senator from Massachusetts appealed to me, I do not think I shall consent to taking that question first. The amendment which I have proposed was not addressed to the phraseology of the bill, which I was criticising in a friendly spirit, simply because if it was to stand I want it to be in a proper shape; but it proposes a new system of distribution. The amendment is adapted to the language of the section as it stands now. If it should be modified, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, I should have to attempt to reconstruct the amendment as applied to the amended section, whereas if a majority of the Senate voting now on the amendment which I have proposed favor this change in the basis of distribution we shall have reached an end which passes clear by this proposition of amending the phraseology of the bill. I therefore think it is the shorter way that we shall vote upon my proposition to change the basis of distribution; and if that is voted down, then the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to correct the phraseology can be considered.

Mr. HOAR. I give notice, then, that I will move mine on the disposition by the Senate of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I desire it to be distinctly understood that if the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is voted down, I shall be very glad, as I believe the committee will be, that the verbal amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts be adopted, so that the question may be taken with reference to the substantial modification of the bill which the Senator from Indiana proposes; and if it is rejected, then that the bill may be modified as desired by the Senator from Massachusetts.

But, Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that while I have the very highest respect for him, as he knows, and as a matter of legal criticism there is no higher authority anywhere upon such a matter than that Senator, I still insist that his amendment is unnecessary, that it is the section as it now stands, and I ask his attention to this point I make. This bill provides in its earlier sections that a certain proportion of money shall be paid by the nation to the several States. That is the first step taken. I say to the Senator that this section has no reference whatever to that act on the part of the General Government at all. It has nothing to do with the paying over of the money from the General Government to the State. The process of the use of this money begins and applies after the proportion of each State has reached the treasurer of the State and is in his hands. If the Senate will follow me closely I think they will see that I am right in this whole matter.

Assume that the money is now in the hands of the State, what is to be done with it? The bill imposes certain conditions as to its expenditure. What are those conditions? They are not all in one section, but in various sections. In one section it is provided that it shall be applied to the support and maintenance of common schools. That is one condition, when they have the money in their possession. Another condition is that it shall be paid out as to any educational privileges to all classes, irrespective of color or race or previous condition. That is another condition that they must comply with. Another condition is that it shall be so used, in so far as they can, as to equalize the privileges of education to all the children—not to give the amount per capita, but to equalize the school privileges of all the children in the State so far as they can. That is the third condition. There are other conditions provided.

Then there is in this eighth section another condition, which is that annually during the first five years the State shall pay, not that the country shall not pay over to the State, but that the State shall pay out no portion of this money unless it shall from its own revenues expend during the same year while it has the funds of the United States for the year in its hands one-third as much of its own money. That is another condition.

Mr. HOAR. The trouble is that it is paid to the State.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will excuse me. If he will hear with an unprejudiced mind, without any sense of committal to what he has already said, he will find that I am right, and I expect him to admit it yet. It may take some time to convince the court, but I propose to do it, because I am right in regard to this matter.

The State having possession of this annual installment already in its treasury, it shall pay out no portion of it for the actual support of schools unless during that same year it makes provision for and has actually expended one-third as much itself. At the end of the year it must report to the General Government what it has done with that money. That is a condition as to what the State shall do during the same year in order to obtain the right to pay out any portion of the money it already has in its treasury, the money being there as a trust fund. It is obliged to expend it upon certain conditions, and one of the conditions every year is that it shall pay out one-third as much of its own money, and if it does not comply with that condition thus prescribed in section 8 it violates the conditions upon which it has received the money, and as a result of its failure to pay out one-third as much at the end of the year, the General Government, being informed of that fact under the provisions of this bill, has a right and it becomes the duty of the General Government not to pay over to that State any sum whatever the next year, unless Congress shall relieve it of its disability.

The error of the Senator comes from this circumstance: that he imagines that this section applies to the power and duty of the National Government to pay to the State. It has no such reference whatever, and all this misunderstanding from beginning to end results from the fact that Senators have not studied the bill.

These are conditions imposed upon the action of the State. This has nothing whatever to do with the action of the General Government. If this condition is found not to be complied with, in exactly the same way as if the State were obliged to report that she had used this money for white children and not for black children or had used it for high-school or academic or collegiate education instead of common-school education; in just the same way as if the State had failed to comply with those conditions, as if the State has failed to comply with this condition and failed to pay one-third as much as the General Government furnished it during that year, that fact or any of those facts occurring in the report at the end of the year to the General Government, what is the General Government to do? To withhold the appropriation or apportionment or allotment for the next year. The Senator thinks this paying out has reference to the paying from the General Government to the States. It has no such reference whatever. It is a condition imposed upon the State in the expenditure of the money after it has received it.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask where the General Government is to be protected?

Mr. BLAIR. The bill, as I said before, is specific about that. It is to pay it over to that officer designated, if the State chooses to designate an officer to receive it; otherwise to the treasurer.

Mr. HOAR. He is an officer in the State.

Mr. BLAIR. A State officer who is to receive this money.

Mr. HOAR. Section 8 provides that no part of the money shall be paid out to any State until it has done something which you can not ascertain for ten years. Whether the payment by the National Government to the State be a payment in the State or not, if it is a payment in the State, as the Senator does say——

Mr. BLAIR. I say not that at all.

Mr. HOAR. Then it covers the payment of the National Government to the State; but at any rate it covers the payment of the State the instant the money is paid by the State.

Mr. BLAIR. Not at all. I take it the payment of the money is from the Treasury of the United States, and that is a provision as to the local expenditure within the limits of the State itself.

As I said before, I desire the adoption of the verbal amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and that the question may be taken upon the substantial thing.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the amendment we are first to vote upon shall be read.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to have that done, because of the suggestion just made by the Senator from New Hampshire that it has no relation to the subject of disbursement from the Treasury of the United States of this money, but only to the distribution of it in the State. If the amendment I proposed is capable of that construction, I want to modify it so that it shall relate to the distribution by the Government.

Mr. DAWES. If the money is to be locked up in the State for five years in order to ascertain whether the State has during that five years complied with the provisions of the law, we had better know it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will endeavor to state the question.

Mr. DAWES. I think it will be better to provide that it shall be deposited at some United States depository, so that it may be safe, if it is to be locked up that length of time. I should like to have the amendment read.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana will suspend. The Chair will state the question.

Mr. HARRISON. I was going to ask to modify the amendment. I think the amendment reads as does the text in line 7, "shall be paid out in any State." If it still reads so, I should like to change "in" to "to;" so as to read "shall be paid out to any State."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana modifies his amendment by substituting the word "to" for "in."

Mr. DAWES. Now I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] moved to amend section 8 by striking out, in line 10, the words "at least one-third of" and inserting in lieu thereof "an amount equal thereto," whereupon the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] proposed as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to strike out all of section 8, after the word "provided," in line 6, and to insert:

Provided, That no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out to any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in regard to the question that was debated here yesterday touching the power of Congress to grant this relief, if it may be so called. I am not of the opinion of my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who thinks we must find authority for a measure of this kind in the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. We have had, I think, enough of discussion about that; but I think there is ample authority in the Constitution for the passage of this bill. I am not speaking now of its details, nor do I intend to speak of its details; but I speak of the power of the Government under the Constitution as now existing to aid in the work of public education.

It must be recognized that a great fundamental change was effected, whether for good or evil, by the amendments to the Constitution; that there has been somewhat of a revolution, constitutionally speaking, by the ingrafting of those amendments on the Constitution must be admitted by everybody who has reflected upon the subject at all. When I say this I say nothing but what the Supreme Court has said; and while I am not one of those who are overanxious to cite its opinions here to guide us in our deliberations, still I think they afford sufficient evidence to persuade us at times to reach right conclusions.

I have often said that the Supreme Court has no more right to bind us than we have to bind the Supreme Court in the administration of the Constitution. Still they have told us what was meant by the recent amendments to the Constitution. They have told this country that by those amendments the persons formerly known as slaves in the country became by its operation citizens of the United States. Before those amendments it is well known that a citizen of the United States was so because he was a citizen of a State, but the fourteenth amendment reversed all that. It declared to the country that every person born in the United States, every naturalized person from that time onward should be a citizen of the United States and of the State wherein he resided. The Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house cases, (16 Wallace) decided that a person could be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State. This is new law to me, but I am not responsible for it; it is the result of the amendments to the Constitution.

This change in the organic law reversed the old order of things, and we have accepted it. I do not intend to argue from that any great expansion of power, but I say a great government like this, which has changed its organic law to meet a condition of things exceptional in its character and which has produced such important results, must have power to pass this bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I ask the Senator a question in the line of his argument?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Does he concede the power of Congress to impose the discharge of certain duties upon State officers? Has the revolution of which he speaks gone to that extent?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think it is a very familiar principle in our jurisprudence under existing laws for duties of a Federal character to be imposed upon State officers, and they have been from the foundation of the Government. If the Senator will examine the Revised Statutes of the United States, although I have not had time to look into them and am not prepared for such interrogatories as that, he will find that in many instances State officers are required to perform Federal duties. A State magistrate may examine a person who violates a Federal law and commit him in some instances. There is nothing in that. The State officer may decline. The courts have held that the Government of the United States can not absolutely impose upon him a public duty, but he is at liberty to discharge it if he desires to do so.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator if he apprehends as a practical question any difficulty in inducing the State officers in that part of the country from which he comes to exercise the duty imposed by the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. None in the world.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That is rather begging the question, I suggest. I asked the question whether the Senator concedes the power of Congress to direct the execution of a duty by a State officer, to compel him in the discharge of his duty? I want that constitutional question settled.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not think that question is involved at all in this matter. I was saying when I was interrupted by the Senator from Nebraska that I did not find it necessary to go to the general-welfare clause for authority to pass this bill. Five million persons who before this great change in the Constitution were nothing but chattels were transferred from property into free people, lifted up to the full standard of citizenship, without any preparation, without any training, and, in many instances, without any qualification. The foreigner who lands upon our shores is required to remain five years before he can exercise that privilege. Why? At one time it was twenty-one years, but under the inspiration of a wise and liberal democratic policy, thanks to the early fathers of the party for it, the liberal spirit in the early part of the century brought it down to five years.

Why was that five years required? As a state of probation, of culture, of training, of education before the foreign-born man could exercise the privilege of citizenship in this great country. Still this great change in the Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance of it took this 5,000,000 of people out of a state of slavery where they and their ancestors had been for two centuries, and lifted them up to a level with other citizens in the Union so far as political rights are concerned. Without the least disposition at the time to do these people injustice I felt that it was an unwise thing. I felt that in the course of time the right of suffrage would follow the right of freedom, but I was not prepared for so sudden and so radical a change. But now that it is accomplished I mean to do all in my power to maintain that right and to make the people who have it qualified to exercise it.

Gentlemen on the other side speak about the South asking this and asking that. I know of nobody on this side of the Chamber who is asking for this bill. I know of some opposition to it here. But the very Government that did this thing now comes forward and proposes to help to educate those people, and I say it is just as little as they could do. There is no question of State rights involved in this, there is no question of local authority here. These people owe their present status to this change in the organic law which made them citizens of the United States, and if there is anything in the reason of the law or in our system of jurisprudence it is that the legislative arm of the Government is always competent to carry out its organic provisions. The Constitution of the United States having made citizens and voters out of 5,000,000 of slaves and cast upon the people of the States the duty of educating them for the exercise of political power, surely there can be nothing very unreasonable in the Government of the United States aiding the States in educating these people.

Where do the States get authority to legislate for their citizens? Would it not be an anomaly to contend that a State could create a citizen, invest him with all the vigor and force and power of suffrage, bring him into life, raise him to the full standard of a full-fledged political character, and after it placed him there could not move another step? The States did not create these people citizens, but this change in the organic law of the Union did, ratified by the States.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Florida permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. I ask him if the States did not change the organic law?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes; the States did it, and gave this power to the General Government and every power that the General Government possesses to-day was derived from the same source. Here is what the Supreme Court of the United States said in the Slaughter-house cases, speaking of the great change in the fundamental law, to which I call the attention of the Senate:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

The first observation—

Say the court—

we have to make on this clause is that it puts at rest both the questions which we stated to have been the subject of differences of opinion. It declares that persons may be citizens of the United States without regard to their citizenship of a particular State, and it overturns the Dred Scott decision by making all persons born within the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States. That its main purpose was to establish the citizenship of the negro can admit of no doubt. The phrase "subject to its jurisdiction" was intended to exclude from its operation children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign states born within the United States.

The next observation is more important in view of the arguments of counsel in the present case. It is that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established. (16 Wallace, 73.)

That is the doctrine of the Supreme Court interpreting the fourteenth amendment. I say, having invested these people with this right, admit as has been charged that this measure is a measure of relief for these people, here you have the authority of the Supreme Court, which says that these great organic changes were brought about to give this class of people the rights they now have. Under this provision of the Constitution many very harsh laws have been enacted and enforced, laws that I have never assented to and would not assent to; but when I find a beneficent provision like this one, brought forth to aid in the culture and the educational advancement of the people thus enfranchised by this great organic change, I shall not oppose it. I do not go to the general-welfare clause, but I go to those clauses in the Constitution which worked this remarkable revolution in our constitutional system as stated by the Supreme Court and which transformed 3,000,000 of men from chattels into free men and invested them with all the rights of American citizens.

This is not the first time that Congress has been called upon to do something in the interest of education. The lawyer who can draw a distinction between the granting of one sixteenth section or a thirty-sixth section of land to aid in the cause of common-school education and the granting of the money equivalent to that land can refine more than I am able to do and more than I ever want to do in the Senate of the United States. It is always interesting to go back to the early stages of our own history for example, when there were great lights worthy of being followed.

It is well known that by the treaty of 1763 between Great Britain and France it was agreed that the Mississippi River should be regarded as the western boundary of the British American colonies, and at the close of the Revolutionary war all the territory lying between the Atlantic on the east and the Mississippi on the west and the lakes on the north and the thirty-first parallel of latitude on the south was included in the lines of the thirteen original colonies. Those limits embraced a vast area of the most valuable land on this continent. Out of that territory numbers of prosperous States were formed, including the one represented by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], not now in his seat, who said that he was not willing to trust Virginia or any of the States of the South in the disbursement of this fund.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I would rather the Senator would not interrupt me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida declines to yield.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that the better portion of the most valuable territory at that time lay within the acknowledged limits of Virginia under her colonial charter. We know the trouble that arose at that early day for fear that Virginia would have more than her proportion of the public domain in consequence of her rights as a colony. With a generosity unparalleled in public history or among the States she ceded that vast domain for the benefit of all the other colonies and dedicated it to the use of the States that might be created out of it. In her deed of cession she incorporated this provision:

That the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for or appropriated to any of the beforementioned purposes or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American Army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the confederation or Federal alliance of the said States (Virginia inclusive), according to their usual respective proportions of the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose and for no other use or purpose whatsoever. (Act December 20, 1783.)

The grant was carried out in that way. It went to enrich the States that were carved out of it, and was used for school purposes and other purposes of a general character to build up the population of the various States that settled that territory and are now located upon that very soil.

Why was the first act passed by the Continental Congress, on 20th of May, 1785, for the disposition of the lands ceded by Virginia and the other States, and which has constituted the basis of the policy in regard to all the public lands, enacted? Mark you, this was under the authority of the Confederation, before we had any Constitution, when we were living under a league. In 1785, before our present Constitution was framed or ratified, an act was passed through the Continental Congress at Philadelphia to carry out the great trust of Virginia in respect to these lands. What did they do? They passed a law that provided that the land should be laid off into townships, that section No. 16 in each township should be reserved for the maintenance of public schools, and that two townships in every State should be set apart for the support of a university.

That was the spirit in which the early fathers met the educational question in the States, before we had any Constitution, before we had any quibbling as to what was meant by the general-welfare clause or any other clause, and at a time when every power not expressly delegated in the Articles of Confederation to Congress was reserved to the States, and when there was not a word in those articles in reference to this subject.

Under that same policy what was done? In 1848 and 1849 a still more liberal policy in regard to the provision for educational purposes in new States was adopted. In the acts passed in those years, respectively, creating the Territories of Oregon and Minnesota, section No. 36, in addition to section No. 16, in each township was set apart for school purposes; and to each new Territory organized and State admitted since 1848 (except West Virginia) the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of every township, one-eighteenth of the entire area, have been granted for common schools. Other States have received grants.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator from Florida permit me to state to him, if he is making his argument from a Virginia standpoint, that there is no amendment yet offered to the bill that could in any wise affect Virginia? That State gives $1,400,000 for public schools, and no amendment offered could in any wise affect that which would be apportioned under the original bill to that State.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I was only speaking of the historical fact.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I thought the Senator was arguing peculiarly from the Virginia standpoint.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Not at all; I am not arguing anything about Virginia except to show what was done with the land which she gave up to the United States.

Other States have received grants for common schools than those I have named. Ohio received 69,120 acres, (and I have no doubt she disposed of it well at good prices), Florida and Wisconsin 92,160 acres, and Minnesota 82,640 acres.

From a report of the Commissioner of Education it appears further that under the acts of Congress passed in 1785 and 1786 there had been distributed among twenty-six new States and Territories 67,983,914 acres for the support of schools, besides what was given for universities and deaf-mute asylums. Of the pecuniary value of these grants some estimate may be formed by reference to the report of Dr. Barnard in regard to the lands granted to Minnesota. It appears from that report, that from 1862 to 1866, embracing a period of five years, Minnesota had sold 210,769 acres, which yielded $1,324,779, that she had got from the General Government. It is to be remembered that the distribution of lands to aid institutions of this kind is a very unequal method, because the lands of the great West went up in value far beyond what they did in other sections of the country, and they were wealthier and richer for agricultural purposes. Where a grant of the sixteenth section of land in Minnesota would be worth it may be $5,000, in Florida it would not be worth $500.

The idea that the General Government has never done anything in this way can not be sustained when we come to remember the millions and millions of dollars that have gone into the public treasury of the States of the West under this land-aiding system to build up and sustain their common schools; and now after 5,000,000 unfortunate people who, as a race, had been in bondage for two hundred years, were elevated to citizenship by a single act of this Government and the whole charge of their training and culture put upon that impoverished section and this Government comes forth with a generous hand under the lead of my friend from New Hampshire and proposes to take a little off the burden of taxation there by helping to educate these people, I say it is commendable. After all, in a great country like this the people are the state, and there was as much philosophy as poetry in the utterance of that great namesake of mine on the other side of the water when he said:

What constitutes a state?
Not high-rais'd battlement or labor'd mound,
Thick wall or moated gate;
Not cities proud, with spires and turrets crown'd;
Not bays and broad-arm'd ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starr'd and spangled courts,
Where low-brow'd baseness wafts perfume to pride.
No!—men, high-minded men,
With pow'rs as far above dull brutes endued
In forest, brake, or den,
As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude;
Men, who their duties know,
But know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain,
Prevent the long-aim'd blow,
And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain:
These constitute a State.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, but before doing that I desire to ask that the bill as amended and the proposed amendments be printed.

Mr. INGALLS. I offer an amendment as an additional section, that I ask may be printed under the proposed order of the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks that the bill with the amendments which have already been made and the amendments proposed to the bill shall be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to offer two amendments to the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. I offer an amendment, to be printed, to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon offers an amendment to the pending bill; which will be received and printed.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the motion is put I wish to give notice that I shall offer at the proper time an amendment to the pending bill, in the eighth section, seventh line, by striking out the word "in" and inserting the word "by;" so that it shall read—that no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out by any State or Territory, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire that amendment to be printed?

Mr. BLAIR. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. I send up an amendment to the school bill to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment to the pending bill, which will be received and printed with the other amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Secretary can read my handwriting I should like to have my amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks that the amendment proposed by him as an amendment to be offered to the pending bill be read. It will be read if there be no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 4 it is proposed to add:

And the sums so paid shall be expended for the education of children of the school age as prescribed by this act of such State or Territory, without distinction of race or color, and shall be apportioned among the several counties, cities, towns, parishes, townships, and when practicable among school districts, as defined by this act, in the proportion that the number of illiterate children in such corporation bears to the number of illiterate children in such State or Territory according to the census of the United States last taken before such distribution. And the assent of such State or Territory shall be first given to this condition before any distribution is made.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-one minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 21, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NAVIGATION OF SOUTH PASS, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in reply to the resolution of the House adopted March 8, 1884, requesting him to inform the House what, if any, regulations he has made in relation to the navigation of South Pass or other public waters in Louisiana and affecting the authority of said State, and transmitting a report thereon from the Chief of Engineers; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COBB, for ten days, on acount of important business.

To Mr. DORSHEIMER, until Monday next, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I demand the regular order.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the gentleman to withdraw for a few minutes his call for the regular order until I can submit a report from the Committee on Accounts in reference to the extra month's pay for House employés.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask my friend from Ohio to withdraw the demand for the regular order so that we may consider some Senate bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I would willingly withdraw the call for the regular order, so far as the report from the Committee on Accounts is concerned if I can then insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw the demand for the regular order and renew it whenever he sees proper.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Then I will withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. DUNN. I renew it. I do not object to the entertaining of propositions for unanimous consent in the usual way, but I do object to a gentleman calling the regular order and then waiving it temporarily for one purpose, giving notice that he will insist upon the call against all others. I therefore renew the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being insisted upon, this being Friday, the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. MATSON. I move to dispense with the morning hour for reports from committees.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 34, noes 32.

So (no further count being called for) the motion was not agreed to (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof).

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, and the morning hour begins at ten minutes past 12 o'clock.

JOHN N. QUACKENBUSH.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5758) to confirm the status of John N. Quackenbush as a commander in the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN HEBERER.

Mr. ROWELL, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 249) for the relief of John Heberer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY STILGEBOWER AND OTHERS.

Mr. ROWELL, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3050) for the relief of Mary Stilgebower and others; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LIEUT. JOHN C. GEYER.

Mr. FERRELL, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2636) for the relief of Lieut. John C. Geyer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SIXTH STREET AND BLADENSBURG RAILROAD.

Mr. ROCKWELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 2183) to incorporate the Sixth-Street and Bladensburg Railroad Company of the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees has been completed; but if there be no objection the Chair will now receive reports of a private nature from gentlemen who were not in their seats during the regular call.

There was no objection.

JAMES BRADFORD.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3701) granting a pension to James Bradford; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH H. ADAMS.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 965) granting a pension to Joseph H. Adams; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

M. P. JONES.

Mr. BRENTS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1301) for the relief of M. P. Jones; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I desire to present three reports from the Committee on Printing for reference to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the call of committees is for reports of a private nature only; but if there be no objection these reports of a public nature sent up by the gentleman from New York will be received.

There was no objection.

REPORTS OF GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Printing, with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (H. Res. 138) for printing the annual reports of the United States Geological Survey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ANNUAL REPORTS OF BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, by unanimous consent, also reported back from the Committee on Printing, with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (H. Res. 137) for printing the annual reports of the Bureau of Ethnology; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DISTRIBUTION OF OFFICIAL REGISTER.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, by unanimous consent, also reported back from the Committee on Printing, with a favorable recommendation, the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to distribute the surplus copies of the Official Register of the United States in his charge among such public, college, and law libraries as have not already been supplied with the same.

HENRY GEE.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 165) for the relief of Henry Gee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WAIT. I desire to present from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a report in reference to the Chinese indemnity matter.

The SPEAKER. That is not a report of a private nature.

Mr. WAIT. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I call for the regular order.

CHARGES AGAINST HON. E. JOHN ELLIS.

Mr. MONEY. I rise to present a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report the resolution which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the charges reflecting upon Mr. ELLIS, a Representative from Louisiana, in connection with star-route frauds, recently published, are untrue.

Mr. MONEY. I ask that the report accompanying this resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In support of the resolution herewith submitted the committee submit the following report. The action of the committee was under the resolution of February 25, which reads:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be instructed to investigate the charges reflecting upon Mr. ELLIS, a Representative from Louisiana, in connection with star-route frauds, recently published, and for this purpose are authorized to send for persons and papers."

The committee had before it, for witnesses, Mr. P. H. Woodward, post-office inspector; Mr. George F. Brott, a mail-contractor, both persons named in the publication; and Mr. E. J. Edwards, the correspondent of the New York Sun, and author of the communication, and William A. Cook, esq., late special counsel in the star-route prosecution. The committee could hear of no other person who was supposed to know anything of the matter except Dr. B. H. Peterson, whose whereabouts was unknown. Mr. ELLIS, under oath, made substantially the same statement which he made to the House on the 25th of February.

The publication in the New York Sun of a copy of a memorandum deposited in the Post-Office Department contains the whole charge. This memorandum was without signature, although witness P. H. Woodward testified that he wrote it in May or June 1881; that it was in no sense an official paper; that it was written as his recollection of several conversations with George F. Brott in regard to the Sixth Auditor and deputy sixth auditor; that it was written some time after those conversations were held; that about the same time of these conversations there was much gossip and rumor involving apparently a great many people, and that there was nothing, so far as he knew, affecting Mr. ELLIS worthy of a moment's consideration. Mr. Woodward professed his esteem for Mr. Brott, whom he says was regarded as a good man in Connecticut, where he married, and also stated that Mr. Brott in his presence and in his office wrote a statement on March 29, 1882, contradicting the memorandum as far as it relates to Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Brott testified that the portion of Woodward's memorandum "which refers to Mr. ELLIS is absolutely false;" that he had never made any such statement to Mr. Woodward at that or any other time; that no such transaction ever occurred between him and Mr. ELLIS; that he wrote the contradictory statement, which "is absolutely true." Mr. Brott said he could not remember that Mr. ELLIS ever rendered any service in the New Orleans and Pearl River business; that he never paid or promised to pay Mr. ELLIS, either directly or indirectly, for that or any other service; that Mr. ELLIS never got nor assisted in getting a contract for him, and that Mr. ELLIS never asked him for pay.

Mr. E. J. Edwards testified that he is the correspondent of the New York Sun who wrote the communication; that it was written several days before publication; that he procured a copy of the memorandum, but declined to say how or from whom; that he never saw or heard of the contradiction made and filed by Mr. Brott; that he published it as soon as he could get it after he heard there was such contradiction made and filed by Mr. Brott; also that he doubted the truth of the memorandum reflecting on Mr. ELLIS before it was published, but knew nothing about its truth or falsity when he sent it to New York; that his instructions received here from Mr. Dana was to "publish records without editorial comment."

Mr. William A. Cook, late special counsel in the star-route prosecution, testified that neither he nor any of his subordinates to his knowledge ever had any memorandum or evidence affecting Mr. ELLIS.

This is a brief summary of the evidence: The whole trouble arose from the publication in the New York Sun of a charge against Mr. ELLIS, to which there was no signature, for which no one was responsible, and which was not official, was no part of any record, and which the correspondent who sent it did not believe to be true before or after it was published. The person who furnished the copy to the correspondent circulated the poison but withheld the antidote. The public appetite is eager for sensation, and in too many instances newspapers cater to it without regard to the old adage that "he who tells for the truth what he does not know to be true is guilty of falsehood" and reckless of the reputation and character of those who are misrepresented.

Mr. MONEY. I now ask a vote on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

The question being taken, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MONEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

SIDNEY HENDERSON.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6090) for the relief of Sidney Henderson, executrix of John Henderson, deceased.

Mr. GEDDES. I understand the first bill on the Calendar to be that bill, 6090, reported from the Committee on War Claims. It was once in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that to be the case. The bill is out of print and the Clerk has sent for the original bill. If the gentleman from Ohio has a copy he will send it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. DIBRELL. That bill, according to the resolution of the House, was to hold its place under the previous question, and it is not necessary to be considered again in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. GEDDES. One word of explanation will obviate all objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that the bill has not been printed, and that the original was sent to the Printer yesterday.

Mr. GEDDES. I desire to submit to the Chair the matter can be disposed of at this moment and without objection, and that a word of explanation will bring about that result.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a question of order. I find in the Calendar of the 17th instant the bill for the relief of Henry Z. Blinn was at the top of the Calendar and the first business in order when the Calendar was reached, but on the Calendar to-day I find the first bill in order to be this bill for the relief of Sidney Henderson, reported by Mr. TULLY from the Committee on War Claims, although that bill was only reported March 19, while the other bill was reported January 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill for the relief of Sidney Henderson, reported by the gentleman from California [Mr. TULLY] from the Committee on War Claims, was placed at the head of the Calendar by order of the House. It therefore takes the first place, and the bill for the relief of Henry Z. Blinn comes next in order.

Mr. DIBRELL. It will not take a minute to pass it.

Mr. GEDDES. I was about to say this case came up for consideration the last day the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. The claim met with some resistance in the form in which it was then presented, and on motion it was recommitted to the committee. It now comes up on the report of the bill as it was then considered in committee. I believe there is no objection to it as it now stands. I resisted the passage of the bill in the form in which the amendment was presented last week.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this bill will be passed over informally and will retain its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

HENRY Z. BLINN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 351) authorizing the muster-in and discharge of Henry Z. Blinn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to so amend the rolls of Company A, Fifth Indiana Cavalry Volunteers, as to show Henry Z. Blinn a private in said company from the 5th day of August, 1862, until the 5th day of October, 1862, and to grant said Henry Z. Binn an honorable discharge, to date from October 5, 1862.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. STEELE. The report is quite lengthy, and if the gentleman from Indiana will allow me, in a few minutes I can explain the nature of the case.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reading of the report can be heard in all parts of the Hall much more distinctly than my colleague.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred bill H. R. 351, after considering the same, adopt the report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-seventh Congress, and recommend favorable action by the House.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 6684, having considered the same, respectfully report:

Henry Z. Blinn, it appears from reliable information (affidavits, certificates, and oral testimony), was duly enlisted into the service on the 5th day of August, 1862, as a soldier in the Indiana Volunteers, for three years or during the war; but before he was mustered into the service, on the next day, August 6, 1862, while acting in obedience to orders from the captain of his company, he was so injured by the premature discharge of a cannon as to render him unable to appear for muster with his comrades. It also is in evidence that the injuries were so severe as to prevent Blinn from reporting to his company again until October 1, 1862, when he reported to his captain, with his arm (which had been broken) in a sling. The captain of his company, recognizing Blinn as a soldier of his company, issued to him a proper allowance of clothing and rations, and continued to do so until the 5th day of October, 1862, when he (Captain James A. Stretch) took the responsibility of ordering him home, whither he went, and remained until he sufficiently recovered to enlist in another company and regiment as a musician, and in which capacity he served until the close of the war. In view of the fact that it was held during the war that where a man voluntarily signed an agreement to enter the service (an enlistment paper) he was thereby held for the service, your committee are of the opinion that the bill under consideration is only giving to Blinn the record and pay to which he is justly entitled; and therefore, after calling attention to the following affidavits, as specimens from which these conclusions are derived, recommend the passage of the bill.

STATE OF INDIANA,
Grant County, ss:

On the 12th day of November, 1881, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for said county and State, Henry Z. Blinn, who, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

In relation to his matter to amend war record, as more fully set forth in his petition accompanying this affidavit:

That when he enlisted, as alleged, he was only about 18 years of age. When he signed his name to the enlistment paper said Captain Stretch, as such recruiting officer, administered an oath to him such as was prescribed by law for mustering men into the service, and he, to all intents and purposes, believed that he was a soldier regularly in the military service of the United States.

And it was by said Captain Stretch's orders that he and others were engaged in loading said cannon when he received his said injuries, and at that time believed it was his duty to obey the orders so given him, as he recognized said Captain Stretch as his superior officer, and knew no different.

After affiant had so recovered from his said injuries so as to be about he went to Indianapolis, about October 1, 1862, where said company and regiment were rendezvoused, and insisted upon being received in said company. Said captain gave him a uniform; he remained in camp with the company some four or five days, when said Stretch informed him that he could not receive him by reason of his injuries, as affiant at that time was carrying one arm in a swing that had been broken by said premature explosion, and affiant returned to his home.

Subsequently affiant enlisted and served as a musician in Company I, One hundred and eighteenth Indiana Volunteers, from September 3, 1863, to March 4, 1864, and again enlisted and served as a musician in Company A, One hundred and thirty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, from June 5, 1864, to September 29, 1864, and subsequently enlisted and served as a musician in Company D, One hundred and fifty-third Indiana Volunteers, from February 1, 1865, to September 4, 1865. He most respectfully submits his claim.

HENRY Z. BLINN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 12th day of November, 1881, and I certify that the foregoing affidavit was read over and explained to affiant before swearing, and the affiant is personally known to me to be the person he represents himself to be.

[SEAL.] JOHN A. KERSEY, Notary Public.

STATE OF INDIANA,
County of Grant, ss:

In the matter of Henry Z. Blinn, late enlisted man of Company A, Ninetieth Indiana, to amend war records, &c.

Personally came before me, a notary public in and for aforesaid county and State, John W. Hurley, aged 40 years, citizen of the town of Marion, county of Grant, State of Indiana, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declared in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

That he is personally acquainted with said Blinn. Affiant and said Blinn were raised boys together near said town of Marion, where both have resided until the present. Affiant was present on the 5th day of August, 1862, in said town of Marion, and saw the said Blinn sign his name to a proper enlistment paper in the hands of James A. Stretch, to serve for the period of three years in the Fifth Indiana Cavalry. Said Stretch was recruiting a squad of men with a view of becoming captain of a company in said regiment, and subsequently, upon the organization of said regiment, was commissioned as such in Company A of said regiment.

On the 6th day of August, 1862, affiant and said Blinn, and a number of others who had so enlisted in command of said Stretch, started for Wabash, Ind., a distance of twenty miles, for the purpose of going into camp. Upon nearing said town of Wabash, by the premature discharge of a cannon, said Blinn was injured as to disqualify him for the service at that time, and was not mustered into said regiment. Affiant went to Wabash with a view to enlist in said company, and did on the next day following said injury, being the 7th day of August, 1862. Said Blinn was loading said cannon by direction of said Stretch to affiant's personal knowledge, and was an eye-witness to the injury. He further declares that he —— no interest in said case, and is not concerned in its prosecution, and is not related to said applicant.

JOHN W. HURLEY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant, and I certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in its prosecution, and that said affiant —— personally known to me; that he is a creditable person, and so reputed in the community in which he resides.

Witness my hand and official seal this 23 day of November, 1881.

[SEAL.] JOHN A. KERSEY,
Notary Public.

(Certificate of official character on file in Department.)

STATE OF MISSOURI,
County of Buchanan, ss:

In the matter of Henry Z. Blinn, late enlisted man of Company A, Fifth Indiana Cavalry, to amend war record.

Personally came before me, a clerk county court in and for aforesaid county and State, Joseph Culbertson, aged 37 years, citizen of the town of Willow Brook, county of Buchanan, State of Missouri, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declares, in relation to aforesaid case, as follows:

That he personally knows Henry Z. Blinn. Affiant and said Blinn were raised boys together near Marion, Grant County, Indiana; that on or about the 5th day of August, 1862, affiant and said Blinn, in the presence of each other and at the same time, in said town of Marion, subscribed their names to an enlistment paper to serve for the period of three years in a cavalry company that was being recruited for the Fifth Indiana Cavalry, which was subsequently lettered as Company A in said regiment; that said enlistments were made at the solicitation of one James A. Stretch, a recruiting officer, and in his presence; that he was subsequently commissioned as captain of said company; that on the day following said enlistments, as this affiant and said Blinn and a number of other recruits were approaching the town of Wabash, Indiana, under command and in charge of said Captain Stretch, said Blinn and this affiant were seriously injured by the premature discharge of a cannon that they were assisting in loading by order and direction of said Captain Stretch. Affiant and said Blinn each lost an eye, and received other bodily injuries, such as to prevent them from being mustered into said service in said company and regiment. He further declares that he has no interest in said case, and is not concerned in its prosecution, and is not related to said applicant.

JOSEPH CULBERTSON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant, and I certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in its prosecution, and that said affiant is personally known to me, that he is a creditable person, and so reputed in the community in which he resides.

Witness my hand and official seal this 26th day of November, 1881.

[SEAL.] E. V. RILEY, County Clerk.

Mr. STEELE. I move the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MAGINNIS. There is no objection to the bill, but in order to make it more secure I will move a proviso which I think the gentleman from Indiana will agree to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That said Henry Z. Blinn shall be considered as having acted in obedience to orders and in the line of duty when wounded on the 6th of August, 1862.

Mr. STEELE. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES M. THOMAS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3932) directing the Adjutant-General of the United States Army to place the name of James M. Thomas on the muster-rolls of Company C, Second Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Adjutant-General of the Army be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of James M. Thomas, late a private in Company C, Second Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry, as if recruited on the 1st day of February, 1864, and who died from a gunshot wound about the 15th of March, 1864, without being mustered, upon the muster-rolls of said company and regiment, of the dates aforesaid.

SEC. 2. That the heirs of said James M. Thomas, deceased, are hereby declared to be entitled to all the benefits arising from the enlistment of said soldier as fully as if he had been regularly mustered at the date of enlistment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

James M. Thomas was enlisted as a private in said company and regiment, in Decatur County, Tennessee, about the 1st day of February, 1864, but there being no mustering officer present he was not mustered. And while his regiment and company was encamped at Clifton, Tenn., on or about the 15th day of March, 1864, said Thomas was accidentally shot, from the effects of which he died soon thereafter, and before being mustered; consequently he was never mustered and his name did not appear upon the company muster-rolls. These facts are proven by his captain of said company, Andrew J. Roberts, and by James Diem, Osborn Walker, and Hartwell Baker, all certified as creditable witnesses.

This case was favorably reported from this committee in the Forty-sixth Congress and passed the House, but failed on the Senate Calendar. Your committee are of opinion, as this soldier was regularly enlisted, and was accidentally killed while in the service, and before muster, that his family should have the benefit of his service, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that this bill be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. COSGROVE. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman who reports this bill. Why is it that the relief is granted to the heirs of said James M. Thomas and not the widow? Was he a married man?

Mr. DIBRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. COSGROVE. I think if the widow is living that the bill should be amended so as to provide that the widow and heirs should he entitled to the benefits.

Mr. DIBRELL. I have no objection to that; and I move, therefore, to amend the second section of the bill by inserting the words "widow and" before the word "heirs."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 2, line 1, after the word "the," insert the words "widow and;" so that it will read:

"SEC. 2. That the widow and heirs of said James M. Thomas, deceased, are hereby declared to be entitled to all the benefits arising from the enlistment of said soldier as fully as if he had been regularly mustered at the date of enlistment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

BVT. MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM W. AVERELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2487) authorizing the retirement of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, with the rank and pay of brigadier-general.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in view of the long and faithful services of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, before and during the late war, and of severe wounds received by him in battles, the President is hereby authorized to place Brevet Major-General Averell on the retired-list of the Army with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer of the grade of brigadier-general.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "President," in line 6, and insert "be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell on the retired list of the Army with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer of the rank of colonel."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill authorizing the retirement of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, with the rank and pay of a colonel."

Mr. MAGINNIS. In order to avoid the necessity of this amendment and with a view to amending the text, I offer the following as a substitute to the bill, and unless there be objection I ask that it be considered as the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in view of the long and faithful services of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, before and during the late war, and of severe wounds received by him in battles, the President be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint William W. Averell, brevet major-general, United States Army, and late brigadier-general of United States volunteers, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired-list as of that grade, the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent. And all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

That this bill has been considered by the committee, and it recommends the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

Strike out all in the sixth line after the word "President," and the seventh, eighth, and ninth lines, and insert: "be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint, Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell on the retired-list of the Army with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer of the rank of colonel;" and that the title of the bill be amended in correspondence with this.

The Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-seventh Congress made a report in behalf of General Averell, and, excepting the part thereof recommending the retirement of General Averell as a brigadier-general, which differs from the recommendation of your committee that he be retired with the rank of colonel, the report then made is adopted. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred bill H. R. 6794, submit the following report:

In recommending, as we do, to the House the passage of the present bill "authorizing the retirement of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general" we do not deem it necessary to enter into any full account of the military services of that officer during the time he was connected with the regular Army. These services and their results were so great and conspicuous as to have passed into the history of the country and to have become familiar knowledge with all the members of the House. We shall do no more in this regard, therefore, than to attach to this paper an abstract of his military history, as derived from the official records of the Government, which we make Exhibit A, together with a list of the battles in which General Averell was engaged, which has been furnished to the committee by the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, and which we make Exhibit B. For the purpose of indicating the relations sustained to these engagements by General Averell, we have added to the report of the Adjutant-General those parts of Exhibit B which are embraced in brackets.

Since, however, the principal grounds upon which this application to be placed upon the retired-list is based are disability and incapacity, which are "the result and incident" of the said service, and because this fact is in its nature one which can not be fully disclosed by the public records, we have thought it best to obtain and attach to this paper such a statement of the nature of General Averell's services, the circumstances under which they were rendered, the injuries and wounds he received, and of the effect of the service upon his health as would be the most reliable, as based on actual personal knowledge, and would show the nature of such disability, and that it is "the result of an incident of the service."

Such a statement we hereto attach, marked Exhibit C, dated 25th January, 1879, addressed to Hon. HORACE B. STRAIT, of the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, by W. D. Stewart, brevet lieutenant-colonel and late surgeon of United States volunteers. It will be seen that this officer was a member of General Averell's staff, was his constant companion throughout the late war, and is of all others perhaps the most competent person living to give true and full information as to the arduousness of the general's services, the nature and effect of his wounds and disabilities, and the causes thereof, and of the danger to his life to be apprehended from his continuing in the service after the period at which his growing disabilities compelled him to resign, as explained by Dr. Stewart in his said letter.

This resignation occurred on the 18th of May, 1865, and not until he had passed through all the perils, exposures, and hardships of the entire war, had seen the complete restoration of peace, had written in his country's history one of its most brilliant chapters, and had learned by his failing health that he could no longer endure the exposures of the camp even in time of peace. We can not be mistaken in saying that in the innumerable examples of patriotic service furnished by the late war no one combines in it more of constant and protracted exposure, danger, and exhausting toil, greater demand for vigilance, sagacity, energy, and self-reliant command, more masterly ability, both in plan and execution, or more uniform success in campaign or battle, than is shown in the services of General Averell.

When at last he was prompted to resignation by the effect of his honorable wounds there was no law in existence which suffered him to be retired with the rank and pay which he had long held in the volunteer army, and in which he had led as commander portions of our armies to some of their most important victories.

To this fact we call special attention in connection with the other fact, that in precisely one year, two months, and thirteen days after his said resignation, the Congress did, for every citizen of the United States who sustained to the country the identical relation which General Averell sustained as a disabled officer of the regular Army on the day of his resignation, precisely what the present bill proposes to do for him now. The Congress, on the 28th of July, 1866, passed a general act authorizing every "officer of the regular Army, entitled to be retired on account of disability occasioned by wounds received in battle, to be retired upon the full rank of the command held by them, whether in the regular Army or volunteer service, at the time such wounds were received." These are the words of the act as found in 14 Statutes at Large, page 337, section 32.

All that the present bill, if enacted into law, will do for this distinguished officer is to put him on the retired-list, with the same honors and pay which the general laws of the land would have bestowed upon him, and did, in fact, bestow upon every citizen in his condition only a little more than a year after his resignation.

No extension of this statement can add anything to the force of the facts which we embody in the exhibits which we annex to the paper, and we therefore here conclude it.

EXHIBIT A.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1879.

EXHIBIT C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 25, 1879.

MY DEAR SIR: As one of the numerous friends of Bvt. Maj. Gen. W. W. Averell, I have the honor to submit for your consideration the following statement of facts, embracing my personal, official, and professional knowledge of his extensive and arduous military service during the late war of the rebellion, and the results upon his health, as manifested at the time and subsequently developed and which still continue:

Early in 1861 I was commissioned a "surgeon of the United States volunteers," and immediately assigned to duty as medical director on the staff of General Andrew Porter, U. S. A., at that time in command of the provost guard of the military district of Washington, including the District of Columbia and of Alexandria County, Virginia. General Averell at the time indicated was acting assistant adjutant-general (with rank of captain) to General Porter, and was at that time suffering from manifest physical disability caused by a wound received in battle with the Indians two years previous, in New Mexico, resulting in an oblique fracture of the upper third of the left femur or thigh-bone, and causing permanent shortening of the left leg by one and a half inches. This resulting disability had been much intensified by the great fatigue and exposure incurred by him as a bearer of dispatches to Colonel Emory, at Fort Arbuckle, Indian Territory, in February, 1861. From this time to May 18, 1865, the date of General Averell's resignation from the United States Army, my professional and official relations to General Averell were intimate and almost continuous.

I was his medical director during the important and exhaustive marches, campaigns, and battles in which he commanded in the Military Department of West Virginia, particularly the unparalleled and continuous march of twenty-three days and nights from New Creek, W. Va., to Salem, on the Tennessee Railroad, destroying said railroad for many miles and the extensive depots of supplies assembled there for General Longstreet's army in December, 1863, and during the most terrible cold weather known for years. In this march of indescribable hardships, difficulties, and dangers, cutting entirely loose from the Federal lines and depending upon subsistence obtained in the enemy's country, and almost surrounded by an enemy greatly superior in numbers, in midwinter, General Averell's health sustained serious permanent injury from which he has never and never will recover, and under circumstances the most favorable to be hoped for will always remain disabled for life. On the return march from Salem, W. Va., after accomplishing the destruction of the railroad and extensive depots of rebel supplies at that important point, General Averell was, in consequence of the failure of promised and expected co-operation, compelled to literally cut his way through an enemy many times outnumbering his command, over a mountainous and almost roadless country, by unfrequented and indirect roads leading through narrow mountain gorges, the streams largely swollen by continuous rains and hail into apparently impassable rivers, forbidding in their rushing torrents the idea of attempting to cross, and yet crossing by swimming his command, artillery, and ambulance train at frequent intervals, in all of which, without cessation or intermission, day or night, General Averell, at the head of his command, led every movement—the weather so cold, the air so piercing, that after swimming the streams our clothes would be frozen stiff on our persons as ice itself.

Thus, through swimming torrents of freezing water, and over mountainous by-roads or paths glazed with ice, almost entirely without food or fire for three days and nights, General Averell led his command, not once seeking or favoring his own personal comfort, until he had successfully eluded the enemy, and reaching Martinsburg, W. Va., himself and his command almost exhausted from fatigue, hunger, and exposure. The effect of this long and terrible exposure was immediately perceptible on the health of General Averell, soon resulting in an attack of malarial remittent fever, complicated with the most serious hemorrhage from the bowels I ever witnessed or have ever known to recover. This was still further complicated by a fall General Averell received while visiting pickets at night, some two days previous to his being confined to his bed, by which accident he sustained the fracture of a rib.

The cessation of hostilities and close of the war left General Averell such serious physical disability—the result of such long-continued and exhaustive service—as to make it very doubtful if it were prudent for him to remain in the Army, with the liability, almost a certainty, of being ordered to the frontier, where he would not have either the rest or comforts essential to the repair and recovery of his health to that extent which he even might hope for by remaining here in immediate reach of all those appliances which his shattered and exhausted health, required his resignation, which I deemed at the time called for and justified by reason of the facts which I have indicated. The muscular atrophy of the fractured limb (left thigh), with permanent shortening of one and a half inches; frequent painful neuralgic attacks, resulting from the lacerated gunshot wound of the scalp, received at the battle of Wytheville, W. Va.; the fractured rib, and the permanent impress upon his organization; his long, arduous, and exhaustive services, make his claim to the favorable consideration of Congress and the gratitude of the country one of peculiar and quite exceptional merit.

In what I have said in the foregoing brief history, of the facts of which I was personally cognizant and familiar, I have but attempted to discharge a pleasant duty I feel incumbent upon me to a meritorious and faithful officer, who has lost his health and spent his best manhood in his country's service, and of whom it will ever be the pleasantest memory of my life to recur to the subordinate official relation I had the honor to sustain to him, or to serve him in the future in any way possible.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

BVT. MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM W. AVERELL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, General William W. Averell was graduated from the Military Academy in 1855 and appointed a brevet second lieutenant in the regiment of Mounted Riflemen. His first service was at the cavalry school at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., and Carlisle, Pa., as adjutant to Col. Charles A. May until August, 1857, when he joined his regiment in New Mexico. At that time the frontiers of Texas were constantly ravaged by bands of hostile Indians. He entered into the defense of that frontier with an enthusiasm and gallantry that could not be surpassed. His captain, Andrew Porter, being on leave of absence and his first lieutenant, Gordon Granger, on recruiting service, the command of his company (F) was assumed by him, and with it he was engaged in twenty-five combats with Indians; first with a band of Kiowas, which he destroyed, capturing the chief in a personal hand-to-hand fight; and afterward with the powerful tribe of Navajoes until severely wounded in December, 1858. For his gallant conduct in these engagements he was honorably mentioned in general orders by the commander-in-chief of the Army, General Winfield Scott, at various times.

The spring of 1861 found him at his home in Western New York, still suffering from the wounds, which had shortened his left thigh one and a half inches and created a permanent false bearing of his hip joint.

Apprehending the frightful danger which threatened the nation, and fearing that he might lose some opportunity to participate in the impending conflict of arms, although partially disabled, he proceeded to Washington and reported for duty on the 16th of April, 1861. The next day he was selected by General Scott as bearer of dispatches to Colonel Emory, then commanding two regiments in the Indian Territory, the only portion of our Army in the Southwest which had not then been lost by surrender or capture. All communications had been severed for weeks and armed secession forces occupied intervening positions, and even the whereabouts of Emory's command was but vaguely known. In fourteen days Lieutenant Averell traversed nineteen hundred miles, three hundred miles being by stage and wagon and two hundred and sixty on horseback, swimming two rivers. Pursued and captured, he escaped by crossing the San Bois Mountains without a path or guide, then two days and nights through a wilderness without food, until, exhausted, lacerated, and bleeding, he found Emory's command, endangered by rapidly concentrating forces of the enemy, and accompanied it to the borders of Kansas.

Returning to Washington he was ordered to mustering duty at Elmira, N. Y., until July 2, when he was appointed assistant adjutant-general to Brig. Gen. A. Porter, commanding the brigade of regulars, and participated in the battle of Bull Run.

He continued on duty as assistant adjutant-general to the provost-marshal-general of the Army of the Potomac and governor of Washington city, and in that capacity conducted an administration of military law and orders which brought comparative tranquillity to the capital for the first time after the war began. On October 7, 1861, he became colonel of the Third Pennsylvania Cavalry, to which command was immediately added the Eighth Pennsylvania Cavalry, constituting the first brigade of cavalry organized during the war, and with which he was the first to enter Manassas on the 9th of March, 1862. He led the advance on Yorktown, in April, 1862, and held the left of our line at Williamsburg, May 4 and 5, and saved Hooker's left from destruction by guiding Kearny to the threatened point where the determined onset of Wilcox's confederate column was checked.

The survey of the country between the Chickahominy and the James Rivers was intrusted to him, and upon the maps furnished by him the movements of the seven days' battles were made. He led the movement to the James and was engaged in several sharp combats on the flanks of the army. His command was the first to seize Malvern Hill, and our army was guided to its positions for that great battle by a sketch of the field prepared by Colonel Averell for the general commanding. He supervised and directed the action of our left during the battle by order of the general commanding the field, and on the following morning, by order of General McClellan, he alone held the front line and the field with five regiments of infantry and one of cavalry and one battery until noon, and checked the advance of the enemy step by step toward Harrison's Landing until dark, thereby enabling the army to secure itself in its new position.

The cavalry under his command was engaged successfully and arduously on both banks of the James River, and when the chief of cavalry, General Stoneman, received sick-leave at Harrison's Landing all the cavalry of the army was ordered to report to Acting Brigadier-General Averell, and by him the first orders were issued organizing it into a corps. During the Peninsular campaign Averell contracted a chronic diarrhea, which developed into a dysentery, but he remained on duty and covered the withdrawal of the army from the Peninsula, and when his command had been embarked on thirty-four vessels he was carried on board the last in an unconscious condition. Surviving an attack of typhoid fever which ensued, he regained his health sufficiently to enable him to resume his command and to participate in the movement of the army across the Potomac in November, when he led the advance and seized the gaps of the Blue Ridge which separated the Union and secession armies. In these operations Averell was engaged in daily combats with the enemy.

During the winter of 1862–'63 he commanded the second division of cavalry of the army, Stoneman having resumed command of the corps, and on March 27, 1863, crossed the Rappahannock at Kelly's Ford with his division and defeated the enemy's cavalry under the command of Stuart and Fitzhugh Lee, this being the first cavalry battle of the war where more than one brigade was engaged, and its successful issue exercised an important and beneficial influence on the cavalry service.

The cavalry of the army previons to the battle of Chancellorsville was concentrated into two divisions, one of which was commanded by Averell. During that battle the cavalry carried out its orders to the letter and was in position to intercept the expected flight of the enemy, but the failure of General Hooker to defeat and break up the confederate army under Lee rendered the cavalry dispositions useless and brought upon it unjust criticism.

After the battle of Chancellorsville General Averell was sent to West Virginia, where many minor disasters had occurred, and where the Secretary of War expressed a desire to have "a live man."

Averell assembled and organized the widely scattered fragments of various commands, purchased horses, and within eighty days after his arrival in the department had mounted, armed, and equipped three thousand men, marched six hundred and sixty miles, engaged in several combats and one battle (Rocky Gap) near White Sulphur Springs. In the latter, owing to the failure of a co-operating force to arrive, he could not drive the enemy from a strong position but fought him until his ammunition was exhausted, when he retired to Beverly, W. Va., where he increased his command to seven thousand men, rearmed his mounted troops, and drilled them daily for sixty days, at the same time covering a long line across the country.

In November, alone and unsupported, he marched his command over a hundred miles into the country held by the enemy, and defeated their concentrated forces at Droop Mountain, driving them from a strong position, with the loss of their guns and stores and sweeping them out of the State for the first time. Returning to New Creek, twenty miles west of Cumberland, after a march of over three hundred miles, he set out again on the 8th of December with twenty-five hundred men and four guns upon the expedition of Salem, on the Tennessee Railway, and during seventeen days and nights, in severe winter weather, traversed four hundred miles of a difficult mountainous region. The expedition was completely successful in destroying the supplies of Longstreet's army and twelve miles of railway. Early's corps and Fitzhugh Lee's division of cavalry were sent from Richmond to aid the confederate forces in West Virginia in intercepting Averell's command, but he "marched, climbed, slid, and swam" through and around the forty thousand men opposed to him amid unparalleled difficulties and privations, crossed snow-clad mountains and rivers with floating ice, and successfully eluded them, with a total loss in killed, wounded, drowned, and missing of one hundred and eleven officers and men.

The resolute and devoted men who followed Averell in this remarkable expedition returned in tatters, and some lost their feet or were disabled by having them frozen. The War Department granted to each of the enlisted men a new suit of uniform clothing gratis. The effect of the long strain of responsibilities and exposures upon the health of General Averell soon manifested itself in a malarial remittent fever, together with a hemorrhage, which left little hope for his life. This was still further complicated by a severe fall which he had experienced while visiting his picket at night, by which he sustained the fracture of a rib.

In the spring of 1864 he crossed the mountains between Charlestown, W. Va., and Wytheville, Va., with twenty-two hundred and fifty men, and fought the command of the confederate General John Morgan, five thousand strong, in which engagement he was wounded. He prevented the junction of Morgan with Jenkins at Dublin, thereby enabling General Crook to defeat the latter and to destroy the New River bridge.

Joining the expedition of General Hunter against Lynchburg, he led his advance and covered his retreat to the Kanawha Valley, undergoing many combats, hardships, and sufferings. When Hunter returned to Maryland with all his command excepting Averell, he found Early before Washington.

Averell, receiving Hunter's orders, came east with his command with all possible speed, and on reaching the Shenandoah Valley and learning that Early was retreating toward Winchester proceeded without orders with four regiments of infantry, three of cavalry, and three batteries, being the first that arrived, and attacked Early's flank at Carter's farm, July 20, defeating Ramseur's division of four brigades and Vaughn's division of cavalry, capturing a battery, and over two hundred officers and men prisoners, and killing and wounding about the same number.

When, on the 24th of July, Early attacked and defeated Crook at Winchester, Averell covered Crook's retreat and brought off several guns; and when Early recrossed the Potomac into Maryland, sending McCausland to burn Chambersburg, Averell, who had been picketing the Potomac, gathered seventeen hundred men, and without orders pursued McCausland day and night, overtook and surprised him at Moorefield, W. Va., August 7, 1864, and destroyed and dispersed his command, taking his guns, colors, and plunder, killing one hundred and fifty officers and men, and capturing four hundred and thirty-six officers and men and nearly half his horses.

Returning from this expedition he joined General Sheridan in the Shenandoah Valley. For twenty-six days and nights he, by order, "kept the enemy constantly in view and harassed him at every opportunity," until the battle of the Opequon, September 19, 1864, when on the extreme right he carried the field works in front of Early's left and decided the action of the day. He turned the enemy's left at Fisher's Hill, September 22, 1864, supported by Crook, and captured over four hundred prisoners and five guns.

He made every effort during the dark night which followed to get upon the enemy's line of retreat, but was prevented by darkness and fallen timber in a forest through which it was necessary to pass. The ensuing day he attacked General Early in strong position at Mount Jackson by order of General Sheridan, who had directed him to attack the enemy wherever overtaken and with the promise of support by the infantry. The enemy, at least twelve thousand strong, could not be dislodged by a cavalry force not exceeding four thousand. The promised support did not arrive, but at 11 o'clock of the night of the 23d of September an order arrived which relieved General Averell from the command of his division by order of General Sheridan, directing him to proceed to Wheeling, W. Va., to await orders.

This ended his military career. He and his friends made fruitless efforts to obtain an official inquiry into the causes for his removal until the close of the war. In order to secure such an inquiry or to obtain some statement which would relieve his record from stain or reproach he offered on May 18 a resignation conditioned upon the inquiry and statement desired. The resignation was at once accepted, without any reference whatever to the condition contained therein.

Believing that the resignation had been wrongfully accepted by the President, the only one who could accept it at all, General Averell turned toward Congress for relief. In 1880, becoming aware for the first time that his resignation had been illegally and improperly accepted by other than the President, General Averell addressed a letter to the Secretary of War withdrawing his resignation, to which he has never received a reply.

In view of the foregoing, and as touching the law and equities of this case, the letter to the Secretary of War is pertinent.

It is clearly shown by two reports by a board of surgeons setting forth the disabilities of General Averell upon which a pension was granted him that had his conditional resignation not been accepted he would have been entitled under the provisions of the act passed July 28, 1866, to be retired as a major-general, that having been his rank and command in the field. He received the appointment of major-general United States volunteers in 1864, but Congress adjourned before its confirmation was reached, and in 1865, upon the recommendation of General Grant, he was appointed a brevet major-general in the United States Army.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill differs from a bill we had under debate before. General Averell sent to the War Department a conditional resignation. With all the feeling of a young and gallant officer who had served so many years and never received anything but commendation from every commander-in-chief of the Army from General Winfield Scott to General Grant, he considered his relief from command was a reproach upon him, and he endeavored to obtain some explanation of the cause of it, and in a fit of wounded pride he sent the War Department a conditional resignation making this request:

If there was any just cause for my removal from command, I beg leave to withhold this resignation until such cause be established and stated by proper inquiry. If no cause existed—

That is, if I have been unjustly relieved—

If no cause existed, I have the honor to request, if unjustly relieved, this resignation be at once accepted.

Through, as he supposed, a mere clerical error his request was never granted. His resignation was in form accepted, although General Averell has persistently denied that his resignation was legally accepted or that he was ever out of the Army. And on several occasions he has submitted that legal proposition to Secretaries of War, and they have never taken it up and decided it. I mention this because that resignation is the only thing that could be pleaded as a possible legal bar to his rightful place on the retired-list. For when he offered that resignation he was by the law of 1861 entitled to go on the retired-list; because the certificate of disability which you have heard read from the Clerk's desk shows he had the right at that time to go upon the retired-list. And then in a year after Congress passed that law which allowed officers to retire upon any rank they held when wounded, either in the volunteer or regular service, he would have taken his place on the retired-list with Hooker, Carroll, Frank Fessenden, and with all the other officers who were by the gratitude of the country placed on the retired-list with that rank, and would have become legally entitled to draw from that time down to this the pay of a major-general on the retired-list of the regular Army of the United States.

That, Mr. Chairman, is all I have to say. This bill also differs from another one which was under discussion in the House in this: that at the time General Averell was undoubtedly entitled to go on the retired-list; that subsequently he would have attained a far higher rank under the law than is given him in this bill; and that he was suffering from wounds and disability.

How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will reserve my time to hear if any objections are to be made to the bill. If there are none, I will ask that it be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wish some gentleman would explain to me the precise difference between the bill pending for the relief of General Averell and the bill proposing to give relief to General Pleasonton, which was recommitted the other day by a majority vote of the House, largely coming from the other side. Once at least I am willing to acknowledge that the gentlemen who generally differ from me in politics were right.

Now, what are the facts here? If General Averell had been simply a volunteer officer and had been wounded in the military service of the United States he would have been entitled to a pension. That is all. No one would have thought of extending relief beyond that. He would have been invited to file his claim in the Pension Bureau and take such measure of relief as was afforded to him by the general laws. Had he lost both eyes and the sunlight had been forever shut out from him, if he had lost both legs and had to be carried through the streets, if he was in such a disabled condition as to require the constant presence of another person, the pension laws would have accorded to him, as it has accorded others, a pension of $72 a month. Distinguished as his record is, he was no more distinguished than hundreds of men who were disabled on the field of battle and who are receiving compensation at the hands of the Government in a much smaller sum than this bill proposes to give him.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will ask my friend a question, if it will not interrupt him.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In a moment I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It is on this point.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am not through yet with this point. Now, the first objection I have to the bill is on account of the discrimination that is constantly made in our legislation against the volunteer service. I know that in a few instances officers have been put on the retired-list as of the rank they held in the volunteer service. But it is only proposed, so far as I know, to restore men who have been officers in the regular Army that they may go on the retired-list; and this relief is confined exclusively to those who have been in the regular Army.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And have had special military training.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes; special military training. Then I say, if I may be permitted to repeat, I find my first objection in that. I insist upon it that unless the officer now occupies such a position as that he may rightfully go, under the law as it is, upon the retired-list of the Army, he should accept either such relief as is now afforded by the pension laws or we should pass a special bill giving him such a sum as a pension as the character of his disability and his services may demand.

This officer, as was the case with General Pleasonton, was at one time in the regular Army. He voluntarily resigned nineteen years ago and became simply a citizen of the United States. He no longer held any official relations to the Government, and after he resigned was no more a part of the Army than myself.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Remember that he always protested that he never was rightfully out of the Army.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I did not know that any controversy on that point existed nor do I now know its merits, and I do not intend to discuss that branch of the case. I know that the Government has for nearly twenty years treated him simply as a citizen; and I know of no reason why, if he tendered his resignation and it was accepted, he did not cease to be an officer in the military service. He is certainly now out of it and has for twenty years rendered no kind of military service.

I take it that an officer when he resigns ceases to hold an official position in the Army, and is no more than the peer of other citizens who have performed military service. He has no more right to go back into the regular Army, except it is intended because of his military experience to make him in fact an officer of the service, I mean an officer in active service, than any other citizen. As a matter of course, if it is intended to put him on active service, then his military training is to be considered because it concerns his fitness.

But Congress has no more right to put him into the Army for the purpose of placing him on the retired-list than it has to take any other citizen who has performed military service and put him into the Army simply that he may go upon that list. Suppose I could find in the volunteer service some officer or some private soldier, if you please, who had performed as distinguished and as dangerous services as General Averell, who had participated in as many engagements and had suffered as many wounds. If I could find such a case as that, I ask gentlemen if it would not appeal just as strongly to Congress to put him into the Army that we might also retire him? You would not do this thing for a volunteer.

Mr. MAGINNIS. You could not find such a case, because this man was in twenty-five battles before the late war began.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the gentleman will permit me, I know of many persons who were in quite as many engagements and who never even bore a commission from the United States.

I think it is about time that we cease attributing all our successes to the officers. It is not true that our victories were all won by gentlemen with commissions. It is not true that they are entitled to all the honors, nor is it true that they are entitled to all the emoluments in the way of pensions.

I do not know why it is that we put a private soldier who is suffering from total disability, as it is called in the law, on the pension-roll at $8 a month, when we put an officer suffering from the same disability on the rolls at $30 a month. I do not understand why it is that we discriminate so largely against the widow of a private soldier, allowing her but $8 a month, and give to widows of officers $30 a month. I use that illustration only to enforce the point I am trying to make, and that is, that instead of restoring this man to the Army for the purpose of placing him on the retired-list, we should send him to the pension-roll, where he belongs. I am willing to pension him liberally; no man in this House would pension him more liberally than myself. But I want him to go to the pension-roll where he belongs. We pay as high tribute to his gallantry and his patriotism by putting him on the pension-roll as we would by placing him on the retired-list of the Army. He would be in good company, with distinguished men who suffered on the field of battle; maimed men, disfigured men, men who have been deprived of their health by reason of their sacrifices for their Government, which he and they have both served. The injustice is in this: for his character of disability a volunteer officer gets a pension of $30, a private soldier $8; but this bill puts General Averell where he will receive over $200 per month. Is this fair, is it right? Let us put him on the pension-roll.

There is no disgrace in that, and why should it not be done? The reason, and I repeat it, for putting him on the retired-list is that he may receive more than six times as much as other officers who have suffered equal disability and who have performed equally meritorious service.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I always yield to my distinguished friend from California.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that he thinks Congress has no power or right to put anybody distinguished for military service above any other person or to give him any particular or distinguished reward? Do I understand him to say that Congress has no right to do that? That is the question which I desire to ask.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have said no such thing.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I understood the gentleman to say so.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Congress has the power, and I suppose the right also, to reward distinguished military services in any way it may please, but the retired-list of the Army was created by law for a purpose. It was intended as an inducement to men to devote their lives to the service of their country so long as they were able to serve. And after they had served almost a lifetime it was thought to be the duty of the Government to see that in their old age they should not suffer. That retired-list was made expressly for men in the Army and not for men out of it.

Mr. MAGINNIS. For men who were eligible either by years of service or by disability.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, either by years or disability. It was made for those who had devoted their lives to or sacrificed their health in the service of their country. If a man entered the regular Army and remained in it, he was entitled, under the circumstances stated, to go on the retired-list. But here are men who have been in the regular Army and have seen fit to resign for the purpose of going into business. If they succeed, they never ask to get back into the Army.

Mr. MAGINNIS. This is not a case of that kind.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If they fail, then by reason of having failed they ask to get back into the Army that they may be retired—that they may retake what they voluntarily abandoned by their resignation.

Now, I am in favor of keeping the retired-list for the men for whom it was created; and I am for putting on the pension-list the men who are entitled to go there. If the general law giving pensions is not sufficient, then I am in favor of making special cases; and in determining the amount of pension to be paid, I would consider not only the character of the wound or other disability but the character of the service.

How stands this case? If I have understood correctly the reading of the report, General Averell was ten years in the Army. At the time he resigned, nineteen years ago, he was but a captain. Had he then gone on the retired-list by reason of wounds received, he would have gone on with the rank of captain.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Will my friend allow me to explain?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAGINNIS. His resignation was accepted before the reorganization of the Army. The reorganization was in 1867 or 1868, and General Averell's resignation was in 1865.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Am I correct in saying that he was at that time but a captain?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Yes, sir; he was a general by brevet, but only a captain by actual rank.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I am correct in saying that when he left the service he left it with the rank of captain; and if you restore him now by this bill, he goes back with the rank of colonel—not with the view of performing service in that rank, but simply that he may receive the increased pay of that rank.

Mr. CRISP. The bill proposes to retire him as a brigadier-general.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. As a colonel, I believe.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. The bill has been amended in that respect.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am correct, I believe, in my understanding that this bill proposes to retire him with the rank of colonel, notwithstanding he never reached a higher rank than captain in the regular service. Now, my last question is this: I want to know why in all these cases the Congress of the United States can not do ample, complete, generous justice by providing for officers of this kind a pension? If the object of this bill is not to get General Averell on the retired-list that he may draw a larger measure of compensation than Congress will ever give him in the nature of a pension, if that is not the purpose, what is the purpose? He will not perform any duty on the retired-list. It is confessed that he is not able to perform duty upon the active-list of the Army. You put him on the retired-list simply that he may draw his pay. Why should we in this way depart from the spirit and object of the legislation of Congress in regard to the retired-list? I appeal to gentlemen—why is it that we can not provide pensions in all these cases commensurate to the deserts of these men?

The other day I had something to say—not very much to say, but some voting to do—in regard to the bill for the relief of General Pleasonton. It was then charged that I voted against that bill because General Pleasonton was a Democrat. I did not know what his politics were, nor did I care. I knew that he had held an official position under a Republican administration. I supposed he was a Republican. I do not know what the politics of General Averell are, and again I do not care. I simply make mention of this because of the attack—not because I think that anybody either on the other side of the House or on this supposes I could be influenced by considerations of that kind. But in response to that statement I may refer to a very remarkable fact, that if I voted against General Pleasonton for the consideration mentioned, there were seventy-two Democrats, gentlemen on the other side, who voted against him I suppose for the same reason. But I am proud to believe that no gentleman on either side of the House is capable of being influenced in his action on these measures by partisan considerations.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman has asked me what is the precise difference between this bill and the bill which we debated the other day. It was urged against the other bill with great force by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], as the reason he and others spoke and voted against it, that General Pleasonton was not at the time entitled by law to go on the retired-list. That was one strong point made in the discussion. Now, the evidence in this case shows that at the time Averell was entitled to go on the retired-list with his lineal rank under the act of 1861, and within a short time afterward Congress raised the rank of men on the retired-list so that they should hold the rank they had at the time they were wounded. This covered the case of Sickles, who lost his leg as the gentleman has stated; it covered the case of General Paul, both of whose eyes were shot out as the gentleman has stated. And General Averell would have been legally and rightfully entitled as much as any one else to go on the retired-list with the rank in which he was serving when wounded and to draw the pay of that rank.

He did offer a conditional resignation, the conditions of which were not complied with. He has all the time claimed that he was not fairly out of the service. He did not go out of the Army to go into business, though he has not been a drone since he did go out. He is a man of philosophic temperament and inventive mind; since his retirement he has done his country some service. These beautiful streets in the city of Washington, of which we have the use, have been laid down under General Averell's patent, for which he has never received one cent from the Government or the city or any one else.

But that does not come into this case. It only shows, however, that he was not a drone since he went out of the Army, but on the contrary was a most useful man. As an officer of the retired-list I do not know of a single man who could be better detailed as a professor of a college for the purpose of teaching the military art or who could fill such a position more ably than General Averell.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we hear a good deal about the difference between volunteers and regulars. We have talked about that also, and pointed out the distinction, as you will remember. We saw the House the other day in the Mexican war pension bill provide for pensioning men because they were in the service, whether they were good soldiers or bad soldiers, whether they staid in the rear or pushed to the front; no matter where they were or what they did, provided they were in the service, they were pensioned all the same.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, rose.

Mr. MAGINNIS. My friend from Indiana I know voted against that bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, and for that reason.

Mr. MAGINNIS. He voted against that bill, as I understood his speech, on the ground that the bill did not include all the soldiers of the late war of the rebellion. Was that opposition based on any ground of economy? Was any ground of economy raised against it? Oh, no; but objection was made because it did not take every one who was mustered into the service during the late war, whether they were good and true soldiers or merely hospital shirks and coffee coolers; the principal objection urged by the gentleman to voting for that bill being that it did not take them, good, bad, and indifferent. All who were in the Union Army were to be put on a common level. As I understand it that was the reason my friend himself gave.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. By my silence, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be understood as agreeing that the gentleman from Montana gives the reason why I voted against that bill.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think the record will show that that was the principal ground of objection stated by several members as why they voted against the passage of that Mexican war pension bill—that it did not include every one who was mustered into the service in the late war.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will stand by the record.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Now I will forever protest against the idea that all who entered the service were equally worthy. The most, indeed, were worthy of their uniforms and their colors, and it would be a disgrace to these to drag them down to the level of the unworthy. I was a volunteer. I knew no service but the volunteer service, but I protest against the view of the case that there is no difference and Congress should make no distinction between men who served the country. I am tired of hearing this demagogical sneer about shoulder-straps and general laudation of privates. I know what the privates did in this war. It was a people's war. It turned out to be a people's fight, and our great battles were won, not so much by great genius, not so much by wonderful and dazzling generalship, but by the valor of the soldiers of the Army. We often lost, as I have already said on another occasion, by the laches of our commanders, and what our armies won we purchased with the blood of our men. [Applause.]

But for all that, Mr. Chairman, every country pursues a policy which makes distinction between the ordinary soldier and the educated military man. We would not go so far as England and other countries, which offer great prizes to those who lead their armies and win great battles while they leave the common soldiers and others without such mark of recognition.

But, sir, if you are to have great military leaders, if you are to have great soldiers, if you are to have men who become heroes in time of trial, if you are to have men who in the time of danger and disaster when the lines are breaking and the columns are flying, who will put themselves into the vortex of the battle, will head the forlorn hope and direct it with intelligent skill, you will have to give rewards to men who thus distinguish themselves by their heroism and their bravery. [Applause.] That country which will not make such distinction will find itself without proper commanders in the time of need.

And, sir, if any man deserves recognition in honor for his services as a volunteer in the war and for that professional skill and ability which enabled him to marshal and mold and guide and direct armies, it is the beneficiary of this bill.

His distinguished services are known to you and we need not go over them.

His wounds and sufferings are known to you and we need not recount them again.

That he had the right to go upon the retired-list at the time is known to you all.

Now a few words about the rationale of the retired-list. It was made for this very class of cases. The argument of my friend is not against the principle of the retired-list, but it is against the system by which officers get on that retired-list. There is a technical flaw in this case, and the only question is whether you will stand by that technical flaw as against the services and wounds of this soldier and prevent him from going on the retired-list with his comrades in the war.

I will yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] for three minutes and to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] for three minutes.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I should like to ask the gentleman from Montana a question before he yields the floor.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I have yielded to the gentlemon from New York and to the gentleman from Michigan, and the gentleman therefore must excuse me.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Mr. Chairman, if I correctly understand the case I think I must give my vote for this bill. I desire in a single moment to present my reasons for that action. If my position can be successfully controverted by the gentleman from Indiana or any other gentleman, then I shall vote against this bill.

The position occupied by General Pleasonton was, as I understand it, this: that after the close of the war, at a time when he was not disabled by disease or by wounds received in battle, he voluntarily resigned from the military service of the United States and entered into private business, going out into the world and engaging in private speculation as a matter of choice. In the case of General Averell we find no such claim whatever. On the other hand, this committee have expressly found that he resigned from the military service of the United States because of disease contracted and disability incurred in that service to which he had devoted the greater and better part of his life.

That being the case, the committee further found that at that time the retired-list was in such shape under the law that he could not be placed thereon notwithstanding his conceded merit and long and gallant service.

If that be true, and he could not have been retired under the law as it then stood, we must say that he is to be commended for the action that he took, because we have here a man who has devoted, as I have said, the whole better part of his life to the service of his country; a man who was broken down by disease, broken down by these wounds; and if he resigned voluntarily to avoid being a burden to his country, it is a commendable thing on his part. But whether he resigned for this reason or not, or whether that was the law at that time, if he voluntarily resigned at a time when he could be of no further use to his country, it should not place him in a position where no relief can be extended. On the contrary, his position is such that he ought to be commended for his action. Now, when he comes back and knocks at the door of this Government asking us to take care of him in his old age by placing him on the retired-list of the Army, where I think he justly belongs, and where he certainly would be if he had the justice done to him which has been meted out to other soldiers of this country, I can see no reason why we should object to the relief. For my part I believe it to be eminently proper to extend it. He is certainly worthy and deserving not only of the honors it would confer, but of the pay it would give him. From his boyhood till the close of the civil war his whole life was devoted to the service of his country. On twenty-six battlefields in the civil war he proved his bravery and devotion; at three different times riddled with bullets, he shed his blood to keep the old flag in heaven; and if we deny him this honor and this protection, this immunity from want in his old age, under the cry of "precedent," we shall have done an ignoble thing, incurred the deserved displeasure of the soldiers, and disgraced our Government in the eyes of the civilized world.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MAGINNIS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], and the remainder of my time, if he desires so much, to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I have but a few words to say upon this question. I have given the report in this case careful consideration, and inquired into it until I have become perfectly satisfied that we only do justice to this officer when we place him on the retired-list, where he would have had a right to go himself had his resignation not been accepted. That resignation, I am satisfied, he intended to make conditional, and I do not think he believed or imagined at the time that it would take him out of the Army.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. May I interrupt the gentleman just there?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. This, Mr. Chairman, is the pivotal point of this whole question. There has been an attempt made to show a distinction between this case and that of General Pleasonton, but every person who has endeavored to explain the matter has so far failed to make the distinction clear. Now I want to know the exact distinction between the merits of this case and the other.

Mr. HORR. I do not know about the Pleasonton case; but from an examination of the papers in this case I can not come to any other conclusion than one which is perfectly satisfactory to myself, that the general himself at that time did not expect or intend to leave the Army, but was simply seeking an examination, which he supposed would be brought about by this effort; and his only object was to bring about this examination, which he supposed, on the application he made, would be given him.

I differ a little with my friend from Indiana on this point. I do believe that this great Government of ours has a right to step aside from the ordinary rule and do for a man something commensurate with his merits without seeking for a precedent. The gentleman from Indiana and myself both agreed in that view in the case of Mrs. Garfield. We pensioned her, and, if my friend's argument is correct, in doing that we almost insulted every other widow in the United States by granting it. I do not so look at it. I regarded it simply as a matter which was proper under the circumstances and warranted by the facts. I believed it to be right to do it, and we certainly did it without regard to any precedent. I think my friend so saw it.

Now, in the present case I think there are circumstances which warrant the action recommended by this report. In this case if there is a man on the whole roll of our Army who is entitled to our consideration it is General Averell. He earned the position by hard service for his country. His record is beyond all question one of great merit. He received not only numerous wounds but severe ones, and is to-day carrying an amount of lead which he received in defense of his Government which makes it appeal to me in the strongest manner. It arouses my sympathy because I was not where I could carry any of the burden for him. My friend from Indiana was; but I have a very strong and warm feeling when I meet a man who stood at the front and received the shot of the enemy, especially when he comes back helpless and wounded and asks us to place him in a condition where he may be able to receive the maintenance and support of the Government. Especially is that applicable in this case, where this gentleman, if his resignation had not been accepted, would have been entitled to go upon the retired-list in a very short time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan if he had not tendered his resignation if he could not have continued in the Army at full pay?

Mr. MAGINNIS. No.

Mr. HORR. He would have gone on the retired-list in a short time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Why did not he go on it?

Mr. HORR. Simply because they accepted his resignation. Have you examined the whole case?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir; and understand he resigned his commission. Further, as I understand the gentleman from New York, he said that he would not be a burden upon the country——

Mr. MAGINNIS. He did not resign at all.

Mr. RAY, of New York. What I said was that he was commendable, if there was no reason for his remaining in the service, for resigning and not be a burden upon the Government; that he was commendable if he had resigned.

Mr. HORR. There seems to be some misapprehension about the wording of his resignation. I would like to have it read again.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HORR. I would like to have this read, if the gentleman will grant me time. The resignation shows on its face that he did not intend to resign.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I yield sufficient time to have the letter read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BATH, N. Y., May 15, 1865.

GENERAL: I have the honor herewith to tender the resignation of my commission as brigadier-general United States volunteers, and also my commission as captain Third United States Cavalry.

On the 24th of September, 1864, I was relieved from duty with the second cavalry division Department of West Virginia, without any cause or pretext being assigned.

Previous to that I had been ordered by Major-General Sheridan to report to a junior officer for orders, and had endeavored to procure of the Lieutenant-General commanding the armies of the United States an inquiry into the causes for such degradation, without success, as will be shown by the inclosed papers, marked A and B.

If there was any just cause for my removal from command, I beg leave to withhold this resignation until such cause be established and acted by proper inquiry; if no cause existed, I have the honor to request that this resignation be at once accepted.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. AVERELL,
Brig. Gen. U. S. Vol. and Capt. Third U. S. Cav.

To Brig. Gen. L. THOMAS,

Mr. MAGINNIS. I yield now to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. HORR. Before the gentleman from West Virginia proceeds allow me simply to add that any one who will read all the papers in connection with the letter of resignation will understand it was drawn by this general smarting under an order which put him out of his command without giving any cause or reason, and he was simply seeking to induce the proper officers to give him a fair and impartial trial. That was all he asked for, and he supposed this would bring it about. Now, I do say that a man who had as good a career as any man in the American service is entitled to some consideration under these circumstances. I shall cheerfully vote to place him on the retired-list.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me if the members of this House would carefully consider the report which has been filed by the Military Committee relative to this case there would hardly be a dissenting voice as to the passage of this bill. The facts in the military record of this general have been gathered, his entire military record has been carefully scanned, and without in the least detracting from the reputation of any other officer either in the regular or the volunteer service it seems to me I am justified in saying that there is no one who stands higher than General Averell to-day as regards the record made during the war.

Looking at the report, taking its data as correct, and I think no one will controvert them, then it strikes me that an officer standing in the light that General Averell does should receive from the American Congress at least the pittance that is here asked for. I can not look at the case exactly in the light of those who acquire their knowledge of it merely from this report, because—and I allude to it simply for the purpose of speaking of that which the report has brought prominently before this House—because I was with General Averell during one year of the time that is spoken of here. I know what the man did, I know what his services were worth, and I know the condition in which the close of the war found this wounded and wrecked officer.

When I first knew General Averell, when I first met him in the fall of 1862 he was as strong and as fine in physique as any officer in the American Army. He was a young man, flushed with the ambitions of early youth, so to speak, and a man devoted to his profession and desiring to do all he could to promote the cause of that flag he was then so gallantly bearing. He was then, I think, about 27 years of age—at least not much over that. When I left him, or rather when he left me, in the fall of 1864, he was a wreck. He had lost that health I have just alluded to, and I know that he lost it in the military service of his country. I know that the arduous duties that are said in this report to have been performed were rendered by that man. I was with him during the twenty-three days of that forced march to which your Military Committee call the attention of the House, and I know that when he returned from that memorable raid he was even then what the gentleman from Montana called him a moment ago, a very wreck in life.

Right here let me allude to the objection that has been made to restoring this officer to the service. It is objected that he voluntarily retired from it. Did he? In one sense he did; in another he did not. My friend from New York [Mr. RAY] has alluded indirectly to the fact that when General Averell tendered his resignation it was not as has been stated here for the purpose of entering into competition with other men that were engaged in civil pursuits and along the by-paths of life, but he tendered his resignation because—and I speak now not from my personal observation but from what the committee report to the House—because of the results of disability and incapacity incurred in the public service. At the close of the war, when he was disabled, when he could no longer render active service in the field even if he had remained and gone to the frontier as most of the officers did at that time, General Averell tendered his resignation on account of his physical disability to endure the hardships of the frontier service. If gentlemen desire to controvert the statement of the report upon that point then they must be prepared to show the contrary.

Mr. LONG. And there was a still stronger reason.

Mr. GOFF. If my friend alludes to the reason that is set forth in the letter of resignation of General Averell, I do not regard that as a reason interfering at all with the cause I now assign. Nor do I, as my friend may think, consider it a stronger one than was this physical disability.

As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] has said, an officer smarting under an assumed or real wrong to his military record may tender, as General Averell did, his resignation. In tendering his resignation he said this in substance: "I want you, Mr. Secretary, not to accept my resignation if there is a cloud on my record; yet if there be no cloud, consider my resignation tendered." That is the way I read it. That is the way I look at it. "Consider it tendered; I have lost my health in the service of my country; I have been wounded; yet I am here to-day to demand of you if there is a stain upon my record that you shall withhold the acceptance of my resignation until that is investigated. And I do not believe there is. I am conscious of my standing in the eyes of my comrades and before the people; and therefore, wrecked as I am, I tender my resignation; and suffering as I do, I demand you shall not accept it until you have investigated my record, if you still claim there is a blot upon it."

That is all there is in it. Now, as to whether there was a blot upon the record of this officer go and ask the soldiers of Ohio or Illinois, the cavalrymen of Pennsylvania or West Virginia, and they will tell you, Mr. Chairman, whether the statement of the military record of this officer as given here by your committee is not a fair and a just one.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Nobody has controverted that.

Mr. GOFF. Congress, on the 28th day of July, 1866, passed an act to which I will now allude for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the point made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], that this officer resigning with the rank of captain should not now be placed on the retired-list with the rank of brigadier-general. The rank on which it is proposed to retire him is even less than the rank which he held at the time he resigned from the Army. Section 32 of the act of July 28, 1866, reads as follows:

> Officers of the regular Army entitled to be retired on account of disability occasioned by wounds received in battle may be retired upon the full rank of the command held by them, whether in the regular or volunteer service, at the time such wounds were received.

At the time that General Averell was wounded he held the commission of brigadier-general in the volunteer service of the United States and he also held the command of major-general in that service.

Mr. MAGINNIS. He was brevet major-general in the regular service.

Mr. GOFF. Yes, but holding the rank of brigadier-general in the volunteer service he had the command of a major-general in that service?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOFF. It is not necessary to go into the question of General Averell's physical disability and mental suffering and to state to the House the cause of that disability and that suffering. I say that had General Averell remained in the service for simply one year longer, then under the provisions of the act of Congress from which I have read he would have been retired with the full pay of a brigadier-general of the Army of the United States. He does not come here, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] would have this House believe, having resigned with the rank of brigadier-general, and ask Congress to give him a place on the retired-list with a rank greatly superior. The Committee on Military Affairs recommend that he be placed on the retired-list with a rank even below that which he held at the time he resigned.

I do not desire to occupy more of the time which my friend from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] has so kindly yielded to me. I desire to call the attention of the House to this case and to speak for many of the soldiers of the States to which I have alluded and of their appreciation of this gallant officer. The soldiers of those States believe in him and the service which he rendered in 1863 and 1864. I hope it may be the pleasure of this House to pass this bill.

Mr. MAGINNIS. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] five minutes of that time.

Mr. KING. It is always sad, Mr. Chairman, to look back into a past so dark as was the late war. As it was the fortune of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to serve with the gallant soldier whose case is now presented for our consideration, I will say that it was my fortune to be thrown in opposition to him. I rise here to-day to speak of him as one whom I fought as hard as I could, and to testify to the vigor and courage manifested by that gallant officer.

My first acquaintance with General Averell, not personally but as an adversary, was on the field. I will say this for him, that in that long struggle there was no one with whom those I was associated with came in contact who fought us with more vigor and more skill than did General Averell.

And there are some other features connected with the service of that officer which I take still greater pride in mentioning. Wherever he went, though he carried the flaming sword of war, he always dispensed justice to the citizen. In that area of country through which he marched the women and children told me in their simple language that they had always been treated by him as a gentleman would treat them. In a large degree he conquered those people not by the sword, but by clemency and by kindness.

One distinctive feature of that scene which always recurs to my memory is this: In the large area now embraced in the State known as West Virginia, except possibly the northern portion of the valley of the Shenandoah, the name of General Averell was better known than that of any other Federal officer against whom we were opposed. And if I were asked who was most deserving of credit for bringing that portion of the country under the influence of the Federal arms I should say it was General Averell.

I know not what may be the spirit which will influence some of our friends on the other side of the House in their votes upon this bill, but I trust that generosity will always actuate those on this side with whom I am associated. I know that had I been on the victorious side in that contest any officer who served with the fidelity and the efficiency of this gallant officer should receive my vote to place him where he will be beyond want, and to do him that justice which a great and powerful Government should always do to those who defended it in the hour of its peril.

Those days are past, but there is no brave man who does not honor and respect an officer who did his part so well and so courageously as did General Averell. And when this Government is asked to do justice to such an officer, if my vote can aid him it shall always be given for that purpose. I shall cheerfully vote for this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MAGINNIS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I propounded an inquiry to the gentleman who preceded me, not because I was opposed to this bill, but because I wanted to show to the House so far as I could not only that General Averell is entitled to the passage of this bill, but that the House did a very ungracious and very unjust thing in refusing to do the same for General Pleasonton. It is true that the case of General Pleasonton is not before us now, but in my opinion if we did not do our duty in that case the greater is the obligation upon us to do our duty now. Every argument offered in behalf of General Averell has convinced me that the House ought now to retreat from the position it took in the former case. The injustice which I believe we did to General Pleasonton is no reason why we should do injustice to General Averell.

Some gentlemen, perhaps, might cite our action in regard to General Pleasonton as a precedent in this case. But, sir, I care nothing for precedents in cases of this kind. Let us put behind us every precedent that would do injustice to an officer or a private. Let us do what the specific case before us demands we should do. I was for putting General Pleasonton on the retired-list, and I am also in favor of putting General Averell upon the retired-list.

The fact that a man has resigned his position on the Army Register is no argument with me why he should not be placed upon the retired-list when his time of need comes. In the case of General Pleasonton more than $45,000 was saved to the Government by his retirement from the Army in a time of peace. As we all know, his services would have been of no great moment to the Government in time of peace. I commend, therefore, the course of any general who goes out of the Army in time of peace when his services are not required by the Government, and I do not think that fact militates against his honor, or his valor, or his manhood, when in his hour of adversity he appeals to the Government for which he gave his blood in the time of his country's peril. It is the business of this great Government to care for those who in the hour of its peril have been the pillars of its support. These men gave their all for their country when that country was in peril, and when any one of them is in distress, whether it be General Pleasonton or General Averell or any one else, I am willing to do what I can in my weak way to extend the relief needed. I make no distinctions among them.

I am not in the least driven from my position in support of this bill because I am told that a man resigned his commission when his services were not particularly needed. I say that a resignation under such circumstances is to an officer's credit; it is a reason in favor of his being put on the list rather than a reason against it.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. MAGINNIS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] says that General Averell should have been retired on his rank of captain. I want the gentleman to understand that General Averell was not at fault in this matter. A young, enterprising officer of the regular Army, he was offered by a State the position of colonel of cavalry, which he accepted. If he had remained in the regular Army, he would certainly have reached the rank of colonel in less time than he could in the volunteer army the rank of brigadier-general. By accepting the position as colonel of a volunteer regiment of cavalry he was taken out of the line of promotion in the regular Army. He organized the first brigade of cavalry ever organized under our Government. In view of the career of General Averell; in view of his military services, which in Europe, as the committee state, would have made him a field marshal; in view of his record without stain; in view of the wounds he received, for he carries lead in his body to this day; in view of all this faithful service to this country, it seems to me it would be a narrow policy on the part of the Government if it should fail to reward such eminent and distinguished military service.

Mr. Chairman, an army in the field without capable leadership is a mere mob. As to military efficiency, it amounts to nothing. In the course of my life I had occasion to try an improvised army against regular organized forces, commanded by experienced and skillful generals. My army had numbers, and that was all. An improvised corps can not contend in war against an adversary with fully equipped troops and with skillful and experienced generals. Capable officers in an army are as necessary as statesmen to a government. The generals, the colonels, the captains in command of troops are quite as necessary as the troops themselves.

God forbid that I should ever detract from the merits of the volunteers of this country who served in the war for the Union or that I should undertake to award to the plumed officers all the gratitude of this great country. We owe the preservation of this Government, we owe the presence in this Hall of Representatives from a part of the Union that was for a time cut off, we owe the glory of our flag and the power of the nation to the men who carried the musket and the saber, and also to the distinguished officers, skilled in war, who commanded them.

I know this officer well. I had the honor to give him a commission as colonel of cavalry before I ever saw him. I watched his career with interest. I have seen him in his broken health. I know his character. I know from himself that he claims to-day he is rightfully in the Army and should have had his promotion. A sensitive and delicate honor prompted his resignation, which was qualified in such a way as to show that he had the honor of a soldier as well as the pride of an American citizen. His demand for an examination was treated with contempt. Retiring from the Army, he has lived in private life, till now, in broken health, he asks that he be retired on the rank he would have had but for the place he accepted in the volunteer service of the country.

No nation engaged in war in ancient or modern times ever had success unless it held before its military men the hope of promotion and of reward for their services. I ask that we now extend such reward to General Averell.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. This case has been argued by gentlemen in favor of this bill as if somebody had attacked the record, the honor, or the services of General Averell. Nobody, I am certain, has thought of such a thing. I yield to him all that is claimed for him either in the record or by any gentleman who has pronounced his panegyric. I have opposed this restoration solely for the reason that it is illogical, and because ample provision can be made for the maintenance of this distinguished officer and for his reward in a proper and regular way.

I have appealed to the gentlemen of the other side to answer why it is if General Averell is wounded, and I know he is, if he is disabled as the gentlemen claim him to be, and his disabilities have been incurred in the military services of the country, that he can not receive ample recognition and reward by being placed, as other soldiers, on the pension-rolls, either under the general law or by special act of Congress. I continue to ask why this can not be done, but they do not answer.

I ask them in addition to this if they do not propose to restore him to the Army, to put him on the retired-list simply because in that way they can give him a larger sum out of the Treasury of the United States than Congress has ever given in a general pension law or is likely to give in a special one?

Several MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If that is the only purpose, as I assume, then it is not the pride of being associated with his brother officers on the retired-list that he desires to be put there, but this is simply a method by which he seeks, or his friends seek for him, to receive larger pay than is given to other men of equal merit.

Mr. CURTIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He is not to understand me to say that. I say he has a right to it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have not said that my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania did say so, but I think I see a gentleman on the other side of the House who did say it, but without his consent I will not name him.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I will answer your question if you will yield to me for that purpose, as the time alloted to this side of the House has expired.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will yield all the time I have in a very few moments; and I would not be talking now but it seems to me the gentlemen who agree with me, and there are many of them, are talking on the other side.

Mr. ROSECRANS. If the gentleman from Indiana will give me a moment or two of his time I will answer him. Do I understand the gentleman will yield to me?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will yield for a question.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I said if the gentleman from Indiana was kind enough to allow me a few moments, our time on this side having expired, I would be glad to answer his question.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Forty minutes remain of the hour.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I will yield to the gentleman some time before I close.

Mr. ROSECRANS. It is in answer to the very question the gentleman has himself put.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Very well. I will yield to the gentleman from California if he desires at this time.

Mr. ROSECRANS. You ask us why we are not willing to put General Averell on the pension-roll; why we want to have a special act for him.

Mr. Chairman, I beg to state to this committee and to the gentleman from Indiana that the Military Committee of this House, representing the House, has adopted a policy on that subject which I think, if fairly stated, the gentleman himself will concede to be a consistent one. We do not propose to discuss here solely on the ground of sympathy, not upon the ground solely of the needs and wants and sufferings of the distinguished soldier in whose favor we have reported a bill, but we assume that any great nation, beside the natural duty it owes to take care of those who have been wounded or who have incurred disability in its military service—in addition to the duty it takes upon itself when it enlists men and in words sweeter than honey saying in case of wounds and death their families shall be taken care of and their widows or mothers or children, as the case may be, shall be pensioned—that beside those duties which it takes by contract there is a third kind of duty a Government owes, and that is to mark with distinguished honor distinguished services. It is not solely, therefore, because General Averell would have been entitled to a pension and is now entitled to have a pension, but also because of the circumstances in this case, his distinguished services rendering it a peculiar one, that we have reported the bill pending before the House. We assume that it is not only the right but the duty of the Federal Government, or indeed the government of any country, to mark its sense of distinguished services whenever it chooses. We did not suppose when the Government undertakes to do that in any case it involves the necessity of doing it for every other case.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think I have the gentleman's answer. I do not differ from the gentleman from California in the fact that the Government undertook to provide for those disabled in its defense, nor do I controvert his statement that it is the duty of the Government to provide generously and amply for such service. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman wholly fails to answer the question I put whether equal services should not be equally rewarded.

The question that I put is unanswerable in my opinion. I put the question to the gentleman, and I do not care to yield further, as I think I have heard his views. Why does——

Mr. ROSECRANS. If the gentleman from Indiana will pardon me for interrupting him a moment, he puts me in a false position and I desire to correct him.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Very well.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I did not say that equal service ought not to have equal reward, nor do I dispute the right of the Federal Government to give equal rewards for equal services. I only say that it is the sovereign right of a great government to mark distinguished services by distinguished honor, and I would consider a case of that kind without any distinction between Mr. A or Mr. B. But when Mr. A comes before this House on a claim for such recognition, I do not think the argument should be made that you must give him distinguished honor because you have given it to Mr. B. The mere fact that for sufficient reasons the Government has given distinguished honor to him does not obligate it to do the same for Mr. A or anybody else.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have said, Mr. Chairman, that I do not recognize the distinction that my distinguished friend from California attempts to make. Now, if I understand the logic of the Military Committee it is this: they do not propose to put anybody in the regular Army except it be somebody who has been there before. Is that true?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I am right so far. They do not propose to put anybody in the regular Army except those who have been there, and they do not intend to put anybody back into the regular Army for the purpose of retiring him except they take him from the walks of civil life, from the broad ranks of American citizenship. Now, I am right in reference to that point. And they take them back as one of the elements in the case because they have been heretofore in the Army and have voluntarily gone out of it to become citizens.

Let me stop to discuss that position for a moment. Then I ask my distinguished friend from California if he does not stop right at that point to discriminate? How can—if that be the rule of the Committee on Military Affairs—how can the most distinguished of all the volunteer officers of the Army get on the retired-list of the Army as reward for his gallantry? Let the Military Committee be kind enough to inform me the road by which he is to travel.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The act of 1866.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am talking about what you have stated is the course you intend to pursue by special legislation, and I stop right there and say that it is unjust, that it is an unwise and an unjust discrimination. I say it is unjust, because if we are to take men in the Army and put them on the retired-list because of gallant and distinguished services, let us take the volunteers and those who have been regulars and all. Why make a distinction?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Permit me to say to the gentleman from Indiana that we have not established any such rule as he has just announced. Nothing but the law can do that. All that I have said, and from which the gentleman seems to draw his inference, is that the great Government for which we are at present acting has the right to distinguish by distinguished honors—mark, by distinguished honors—distinguished services. Now, whenever the law does that or directs that it be done to any class, I take it for granted that an honorable committee of the House of Representatives is at all times obliged to follow the law.

I have not undertaken to establish the proposition that we would not consider the case of a man who was in the volunteer service and put him on the retired-list. The case has not transpired, and we have not adopted such a rule as the gentleman seems to imply.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I can not understand the statement made by the gentleman from California and that of my friend [Mr. MAGINNIS] from Montana. I can not understand both of them. One or the other must certainly be mistaken or else I have misunderstood them. A few moments ago the gentleman from Montana said the policy of the committee was to confine relief of this kind to those who had belonged to the regular Army.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I am only speaking of what the committee has done. The gentleman from California speaks of what the committee might do.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Oh, Mr. Chairman, nobody doubts for a moment that the Committee on Military Affairs might report a bill that will put every American citizen, man, woman, and child, white or black, everybody, without regard to race or color or previous condition of servitude, upon the retired-list if they choose to exercise that power. But so far as the report of the committee develops a policy it proposes to confine this character of relief wholly to officers who have been at some time in the regular Army. That is one of the reasons that I protest against this legislation.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That is the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I assume that to be the case, because so far as I know neither the Military Committee of this House nor any other Military Committee within my knowledge has departed from that rule.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Ah! I will remind my friend that the Military Committee at one session reported a bill to place a volunteer general on the retired-list and my honored friend from Indiana voted for it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from Montana may know that; I do not.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I refer to General Shields.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. No; I do not think I did. When the Democratic party defeated General Shields for Doorkeeper with a confederate brigadier when he was a candidate for that office I think I was willing to assist the Democracy in repairing their wounded honor by doing something handsome for General Shields. I may have assisted them in doing something to get them out of the ridiculous dilemma in which they had placed themselves by that vote.

Mr. REED. Was not that a question of pensioning General Shields?

Mr. MAGINNIS. No; it was to put him on the retired-list.

Mr. REED. With what rank?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. With the rank of defeated Doorkeeper. [Laughter.]

If the Committee on Military Affairs intend to establish a precedent by this bill, let it be a precedent to be applied to all persons who have performed distinguished services in the Army of the United States. But they will not do that. The House will not do it. The Congress of the United States do not think of such a thing. That retired-list was never intended to exceed in number four hundred. It was made for a particular purpose; and gentlemen on the other side do not intend to increase the aggregate of that retired-list very largely.

Let me say further, although I had not intended to talk at this length, it has been suggested that the resignation that has been read at the Clerk's desk was only a conditional resignation, and that General Averell in fact did not expect to get out of the service by reason of it. Why, sir, I think I can not be mistaken as to what that tender of resignation is and what it means. It says briefly this: "I desire to resign if there are no charges against me; if there are charges, this is not a resignation; if there be no charges, this is a resignation." And its acceptance was equivalent to saying on the part of the Executive there were no charges pending against him. Gentlemen of the committee may read it and they will see whether I have misinterpreted that resignation. If they say I have, I will wait right here until they correct me. The paper is at the desk. If they do not contradict what I say, then I may stand upon it that he did know that this was to be a resignation.

Mr. ROSECRANS. It was intended to force an examination of charges.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I speak of what the resignation says. I do not know what there was behind it. It may have been, for all I know, that General Averell was disgusted with the treatment he had received at the hands of some of his superior officers, and resigned to express his contempt for them. I do not know whether that is the case or not. I have as much right to suspect that was so as to suppose there was something behind this resignation which it did not contain.

One word more and I am done. I have not said anything in this case certainly that can be construed to mean that it is not the duty of the Congress to make ample provision for this distinguished man. I indorse everything that has been said in regard to his character and his record. I have simply protested against this measure because I believe that it is establishing a precedent from which we will be compelled to retreat. We had better stop now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has twenty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield me two or three minutes.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have promised to yield to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL]. I yield that gentleman five minutes.

Mr. DIBRELL. As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs it is due I should define my position in regard to this matter. I agree with everything the gentleman from Indiana has said in regard to the precedent this would establish. I think it is a bad one. I admit that I voted for the proposition to place General Shields on the retired-list. I did that through sympathy for that gentleman. But I have never given a similar vote since, and I do not expect again to vote that one who has resigned or gone into private life to enter upon the business of a civilian should be placed on the retired-list.

I admit that everything that has been said about the military record of General Averell is true—that he was a gallant soldier and all that. But if you place him on the retired-list you establish a precedent for a large number of others. Several cases are already on the Calendar now ready to be acted on. Others are before the Committee on Military Affairs. And a number are waiting ready to come in should this precedent be established. When this is done you can not stop there. These other gentlemen have influence enough outside to get the same action from the Military Committee and from Congress if this bill should be passed.

I do not violate any of the privileges or reveal any of the secrets of the committee when I say that this report was not unanimous by any means. It passed the committee by a majority, but is not a unanimous report. I voted against it in the committee and expect to vote against it in the House. I think the proposition ought to be rejected. I think all such applications ought to be rejected which come from men who have retired from the Army and have been engaged in the avocations of private life for the last twenty years, and who now come asking to be restored to the privileges they would have enjoyed had they remained in the Army. The privileges of the retired-list were intended only for the officers of the Army who were worn out in the service. They were never intended for civilians who have gone into private life, and who, perhaps having failed in private business, come back and ask the Government to take charge of them and support them.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, addressed the Chair.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I believe I still control the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not propose to take the same view as the gentleman from Indiana, and should like to have the floor in my own right.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I yield the floor for the present, reserving the time I have left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has fifteen minutes remaining of his time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. There seems to be one trouble in the mind of my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], and that is that this bill is illogical, that it will establish a dangerous precedent. He was frank enough to state that that is the only reason he has for opposing the bill. In a case of this kind that does not trouble me at all which seems to trouble him.

There are some questions which come up here to be acted upon which do trouble me somewhat. But when a question is presented that involves the recognition of the merits and services of a fellow-soldier I am not very particular in what shape it may come before me. I voted to pension the Mexican soldiers; I voted to retire General Pleasonton, another gallant soldier; and I shall vote for the pending bill. I hope that the majority of this House before this session shall close will go further than they have yet done, that through their able Committees on Pensions they will give me an opportunity to vote for some pension bill in behalf of the tens of thousands of poor soldiers who so far have had no place on this floor except in the mere cold, simple matter of the introduction of bills for their benefit.

I desire to say to my good friend from Indiana that he should not exert his giant intellect and expend his great eloquence in opposing this bill. When we find the other side of the House recognizing distinguished services in behalf of the perpetuation of the Republic, let us join hands and hearts with them; I am prepared to do it. And if they do not go still further than they have yet done and remember other soldiers of the Union, they will hear from me wherever I can strike at them, and they will hear from the soldiers of the Republic whenever they have a chance to be heard.

I want to quote a little from the Scriptures; I may not give it in hæc verba.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I should not think you would.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And if I do not, then I trust my friend from Indiana, whose memory no doubt teems with the early teachings of his youth——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Oh, yes; I will forgive you for any mistake of that kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not ask you to forgive me. I am inclined to think that you will want some forgiveness yourself.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not expect you to quote the Scriptures correctly, because it is a work with which I am afraid you have but little acquaintance. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The lack of Christian feeling which you have shown in antagonizing this bill makes me fear that you were not brought up with the Christian instructions which I myself enjoyed. [Continued laughter.] But I want to say this: I remember something of this kind in the Holy Scriptures, something to this effect: The apostles of the Lord came to Him one day and said, "Master, as we came along we found one by the wayside casting out devils; but he did not do it in Thy name and we forbade him." The Lord answered and said, "Forbid him not; he that is with us can not be against us."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Well, I do not see the application of that.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The Lord was not afraid of precedents; the Lord was not afraid of illogical methods. When He found that the efforts of that person by the wayside pointed toward generous and noble action He said, "Let him alone; let him work." And I say to my friend from Indiana, when our Democratic brethren are in favor of recognizing those who stood as General Averell did, facing the foe in twenty-six battles, then I say, "Gentlemen, God bless you; go on; I forbid you not, but I will vote with you."

But I shall ask them to go further and remember the thousands of poor fellows in this country who because of ineffective pension laws can not obtain proper recognition of their services. I demand that you shall whip up your committees on pensions and make them bring in bills here that will do more than recognize old Mexican soldiers, God bless them; do more than recognize those who graduated at West Point, and God bless them also. Make your committees give us bills which will provide wholesome pension laws, which will provide for the brave but humble fellows who have not money to prosecute their pension claims, and who find the laws now on your statute-books an actual prohibition of their securing their rights.

I take this occasion to appeal to the House and to say that I hope no member will be troubled about precedents, but that each one here will cast his vote for General Averell. Let us join teams with our brethren across the aisle here, and then if they do not "come up to the scratch"—I hope as a Western man I may be allowed to use that phrase—we will remind them that as they joined us in one good cause they should not hesitate to go on with other good works.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I resume the floor and yield——

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] if he desires.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I want merely to move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will yield for that purpose.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2487) authorizing the retirement of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, with the rank and pay of brigadier-general, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I now move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar. Pending that motion, I also move that all debate upon the pending bill shall close in thirty minutes, with the understanding that ten minutes of that time shall be controlled by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], ten minutes by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], and ten minutes by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

The SPEAKER. The division of time for debate is a matter for arrangement in Committee of the Whole.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

VACATING ORDER FOR EVENING SESSION.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the question on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, the Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON], requests unanimous consent to vacate the order for the evening session for this evening only, as he is not able to be present. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the order for this evening's session is vacated.

WILLIAM W. AVERELL.

The motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole and resumes the consideration of the bill for the benefit of General Averell. By order of the House all debate upon the bill is limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] is first entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope the Chair will notify me at the end of five minutes, as I desire to yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER]. I do not know what I have said that could justify the attack made upon me by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. You do not consider that an attack, do you?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman intimated that there was a want of generosity on my part toward the soldiers of this country. Why, sir, I have been here seven years endeavoring on this floor in a very humble way to fight the battles, so far as there was necessity for it, of those who were in the Army of the United States. I have voted at all times for the most liberal propositions that have been made for pensioning persons who have been disabled in the service and for providing for the dependent families of those who sacrificed their lives for their country. On this question I have made a record and I am proud of it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not want my friend from Indiana to subject me to the painful necessity of hearing him defend himself, as it were, from an attack on my part. I think that any one who knows the splendid patriotic record of General BROWNE knows that any man would discredit himself before the country by attacking my friend from Indiana on that head. I did not intend any such thing. I only hoped that my good friend would not, for fear of a precedent, be led into the mistake, as I view it, of opposing this bill, which I hope is in the right direction, and I have no doubt that it is, so long as it seeks to reach that common result for which he says he has so long labored.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Now, that is just what I do fear—precedent. Precedent has been drummed into the service, I will not say in this class of cases, but it has been drummed into the service for the purpose of defending every species of iniquity. Bad precedents have confronted us every day of our legislative life; and I do not intend, if I can help it, at any time in the future, to so vote in any case as to establish a bad precedent. Congress legislates all the time under the shadow of precedents. They lead us and mislead us. Let us from this time forward, whatever may have been our course in the past, establish good precedents and insure good legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, no man shall go farther than myself for the purpose of making any krnd of recognition of the services of meritorious officers or privrte soldiers. I will vote for as liberal provision in the proper way for General Averell as any man on this floor. I oppose this bill, as gentlemen who agree with me have opposed it, because we think it establishes a bad precedent; and for that and the other reasons given I will vote against it. Gentlemen on the other side are, so far as I know, as generous in voting pensions and in rewarding the merit of the Union soldiery as we are. A generous spirit has characterized their action in this connection so far as I have been able to observe it. Even my friend from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL], who was on the wrong side in the fight of 1861, has gone as far as I have gone in voting liberal pensions to Union soldiers. I am glad he has done so. I think he ought to do so. I think that he and those who were associated with him made a pension-roll necessary. I think they ought to help in voting to put men on that roll, and that they ought to pay liberally out of their own pockets to its support. We did not want the war; I am sorry it came. We did not want the pension-roll; I am sorry the necessity for it exists. Those who brought on the war ought to vote liberal pensions and help to pay them. I say this to these gentlemen in kindness. They ought to do these things gracefully, as they seem inclined to do. With these remarks, I do not propose to talk any further on this subject.

I yield the residue of my time to my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I admit that the Committee on Military Affairs has, in the case of General Averell, presented probably as strong a case as could be presented. The magnificent record of General Averell is all in his favor when he appears before the House asking to be restored to the regular Army in so far as to be permitted to go upon the retired-list with the rank and pay of a colonel. Nobody questions his record or his distinguished services. But what is the question before us? Under the law regular Army officers who are disabled in the service, or who have served a given number of years, are permitted to go upon the retired-list and for the remainder of their lives to draw certain monthly pay.

Under the operations of this law there have occurred within my own knowledge cases of this kind. In a certain battle a volunteer officer has lost an arm and in the same battle an officer of the regular Army also lost an arm. One was educated at West Point at the Government expense; the other educated himself. They were of about the same age and entered active military service about the same time. One of those men receives quarterly from the Government compensation at the rate of $30 a month; the other draws pay at the rate of $150 a month. I believe this distinction in such cases most unjust. Disabled volunteer officers all over the country are complaining of this injustice and asking us to change the law and permit them to go upon the retired-list at the same rate of pay for like disabilities as regular Army officers receive. That is, for the same disability they ask the same compensation as the regular Army officers receive.

But we know very well we can not restore to three-quarter's pay, nor half-pay, all the disabled volunteer officers. To do that and leave the private soldier with only his pittance would be great injustice to him; nor can we at this late day change the law so as to strike off of the retired-list those who have gone there for disabilities under the law as it exists, but we can prevent further inequalities such as those complained of.

But here comes, Mr. Chairman, another class of cases, a class to which General Averell belongs and to which General Pleasonton belongs, whose case we had up the other day, officers who, having been educated at West Point, having served in the regular Army for a longer or shorter period, have chosen to leave the military service and retire to private life.

How many there are of this class I do not know, but that there are a considerable number I do know. If we propose to restore this class of officers——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire ten minutes more.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if it is proposed to permit this class who voluntarily retired to be reinstated in the Army and go upon the retired-list—which I do not think we ought to do, but if we do—then this right ought to be extended to all of that class who desire restoration and retirement on that list, and not to one or two favored ones. Why should we single out a few and leave out others, perhaps just as meritorious? That was the ground on which I opposed the bill to restore General Pleasonton the other day. That is, that we should not single out a few and give them the right while denying it to the rest. I say the very essence of injustice is to grant one what is denied to another.

How many there are asking to be placed on that list I do not know. No information has been given to us in this discussion, but if we establish the principle, doubtless a majority of those who at one time or another have resigned will desire to return and be placed upon the retired-list. That is the precedent this bill establishes. If we do that, and establish the precedent that when an officer resigns and elects to retire to private life and gives up the right to be placed upon the retired-list he may nevertheless come to Congress and be restored, with all his original rights, instead of being classed as a volunteer officer entitled to a pension only—I say if we are going to establish that principle we ought to open the doors wide enough to admit all of that class and volunteer officers too. For heretofore officers who have resigned their commissions in the regular Army have been classed under disability acts with volunteer officers. And did not the volunteer officers perform as meritorious service as the regular officers? I have some figures here, Mr. Chairman, which I will give, that may throw some light on the relative service of volunteer and regular soldiers. The total deaths in the late war, as given in the record I hold in my hand, were 304,369.

Of these 5,724 were from the regular Army and the rest from the volunteer forces. I find that there were killed or died of wounds or disease during the war 8,838 volunteer officers and 267 regular officers. These figures show pretty well the relative strength of the regular and volunteer forces and the part each, with its officers, played, and without depreciating the services of the regular Army officers, it is but the truth of history to say that the battles of the war were fought mainly by volunteer soldiers commanded by volunteer officers. Are not those who fought side by side and sustained like disabilities entitled to like compensation? Do you lay down the doctrine that the arm of a man educated at West Point is worth $150 a month, while the arm of a man who educated himself is only worth $30 a month? That is the principle of this bill; but, Mr. Chairman, that will not do. The law, I know, gives to the regular Army officer the right to a place upon the retired-list with a rate of pay much above the pension rate of volunteer officers, but it presupposes life service, which is not this case, and officers who voluntarily retired from the regular Army at the close of the war stand upon precisely the same ground as the volunteer officer and entitled to no more and no less.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understood the gentleman from Montana to yield to me ten minutes.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I have yielded to the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And the gentleman from Indiana yielded me five minutes, making fifteen in all. I only desire a few minutes more in order to touch another point.

I admit that the gentleman from Montana, if he is right as to facts, lays the foundation of a claim stronger than the case before us the other day, and if I were entirely satisfied on that point I do not know but I should be willing to let this case go as an exceptional one. And that is this, that General Averell in fact was entitled to go upon the retired-list when he resigned his commission.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I can say to the gentleman from Ohio that there is not the least doubt of that fact. I thought it was a strong point and the only strong point made in the other case. General Averell was entitled at the time his resignation was accepted to go upon the retired-list.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And it is claimed, too, as I understand, that General Averell did not consider himself to be out of the service. These are considerations I can not discuss, for I know nothing about them. Certainly, if there remains to General Averell any legal right or equitable right to go onto the retired-list, I would not wish to deprive him of that right. But I supposed this claim was pressed mainly on the ground of his services and his wounds, and I can not consent to place any officer on the retired-list on such grounds who has voluntarily resigned and thereby placed himself in the category of volunteers. I can not vote to make a distinction in the matter of disability between those educated at West Point by the Government and those who educated themselves, and such distinction is made every time we vote to place a man on the retired-list in order that he may draw more pay than another suffering a like disability. We can not do that in my judgment unless a legal right on his part can be established.

Mr. MAGINNIS. General Averell has always claimed he never left the service, and has repeatedly called upon the Secretary of War to decide that question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If that right exists, I would not cast a vote to deprive General Averell of it. I must say I am not entirely satisfied on that point. I will ask a question the answer to which may throw some light upon the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MAGINNIS. General Averell has asked the Secretary of War to decide whether he was not yet in the Army. How much time have I left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining of the time limited by the House.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect, although I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and have given some little attention to this question, to say a word in this connection. But things have changed, so that I want to be heard for a very few moments.

I disagree materially with my distinguished friend from Indiana [General BROWNE] upon the doctrine of putting every man upon an equality, as I understood him, in several respects, and putting all upon the pension-rolls—those who served in the volunteer forces as well as those who served in the regular Army—without regard to service.

Nor do I agree, I may be permitted to say, with the views entertained by the framers of our pension laws as they now stand. I hold that every pension ought to be given and every pension case considered upon its individual merits. I hold to the belief that pensions should be granted according to the merits of the man who claims the pension.

In that way our pension laws, in my judgment, would be far more effective and just in their operation. I do not mean to be understood as saying that the precise amount of disability that may attach to any particular case should govern. That is only one of the incidents which ought to be considered—the disability and the amount of the disability. But I mean that in the consideration of pension cases not only should that item be considered, but the amount of service and the kind of service performed should have due weight in fixing the rate. I care not, Mr. Chairman, whether the applicant be an officer or a private, if under the dispensation of an all-wise Providence he has been permitted to perform superior service for the good, for the honor, and for the glory and the happiness of his country, he ought to receive as a pension superior pay and recognition. I care not—and this I put upon the eternal principles of right and justice—I care not whether he was a volunteer, or whether he was drafted, or whether in the regular Army, the same principle should control.

Where he served and how he served is not a question that should enter into the consideration of the case, if only he served well and faithfully. I say nothing, Mr. Chairman, in disparagement of the volunteer officers or soldiers of our Army. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] has so well said, they did the majority of the fighting; and why? Because they were greatly superior in numbers. No man should pretend to draw a distinction between the merits of our soldiers. All of them did their duty; and the volunteer forces did no better fighting, nor would I make any invidious distinction in their favor as against the regular Army. There was no better fighting upon one side than the other; and where all men did their duty to the best of their ability all deserve equal praise.

But, Mr. Chairman, here is a man, the beneficiary of the present bill, who, all will agree, distinguished himself in the military annals of this country, and stands I may say without a parallel in the history of the late war; a man whose services were great, notoriously great, wonderfully great. Then his reward should also be great.

Those that fought with him and under him stand upon this floor and say that much for him. No man who knows the history of the late war could say otherwise. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] fought with him, and says that he did much; and I know that to be true. I saw him. We made a careful investigation in the Committee on Military Affairs, and made our report to this committee. His record was before that committee, the record of his services, in which it is shown that his services were wonderfully great for his country; that he was wounded, and still served his country even when it seemed that death was near at hand. When he was wounded almost to death, yet he remained proudly at the front of his forces fighting, not willing to quit his country in the time of his country's danger. No matter though weak and exhausted, he was still ready to do his duty, ready to fight for the honor and safety of his country.

Mr. Chairman, shall we refuse him relief when those men who fought against him stand upon this floor, one of them a general in the confederate army, and render their testimony to his achievements? They pay their part of the pensions and their proportion of the retired-list, and yet they say he is deserving of this reward.

And here just let me notice one remark of my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. It is true they made the wounds, fighting in the honest conviction of what they believed to be right for their government, and their government I would always have fought to destroy. But, sir, I did not want to destroy the proud material of which that government was made. They stand upon this floor to-day honest, honorable men. They are being taxed as much as any other portion of the country, and though they are met with slanders, yet here they come with singular magnanimity to offer and extend the helping hand of this great Government of which they bear their proportion to the distinguished men who fought its battles against them.

I think, sir, it is time that these distinctions as to North and South should cease in this Hall, as it has been stopped by the wise voice of the people of this country. Is it to be a legacy of war which shall remain alone in Congress? These men come, as I have said, with wonderful unanimity and pay their taxes for the support of the maimed and crippled by the war; and when they see gallant, honorable officers and soldiers who fought the battles of the Union in want and distress, forgetting all prejudice in a spirit of admiration for their gallantry, forgetting the past, numbering their government with the lost things of the earth and standing here in the light of the present with the living things of to-day to build up the whole country, they are the first to extend the helping hand of the nation to its defenders, and when a man is rightfully entitled to a pension they are unanimously in favor of it.

I agree, sir, with the sentiment so well expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] that the failure of the House to pass the bill for the relief of General Pleasonton is no ground for a refusal to do justice in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK].

Mr. HANBACK. The State of Kansas has within her confines nearly 100,000 soldiers, men who responded to the call of their country in the hour of its trouble, men who have come from every State in this Union and settled there. I say to you, sir, and to the members of this committee to-day, that the vote which I shall give in favor of this splendid man for his splendid service to his country will receive commendation from every one of those soldiers from one end of my State to the other. I am glad that this precedent is being established. God grant that it may be far more established, and that these men, who left everything behind them, who left home and hope and threw life itself into the balance, shall receive from this Republic that meed of praise and protection their services so well entitle them to. I shall vote for this measure with pleasure.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Just one word. In commenting upon those officers like Sickles and Paul and Fessenden and others who were put on the retired-list under the act of 1866 I did not want to be understood as reflecting in any way against them. On the contrary, I regard that as the bright particular part of the list. And I only said General Averell belonged to the same catagory in order to show his right to go on the retired-list.

I understand it has been agreed without objection that the substitute which I have offered take the place of the bill; and I move that the substitute be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The bill as amended by the adoption of the substitute was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

SIDNEY HENDERSON.

Mr. DIBRELL. The bill (H. R. 6090) reached this morning and informally passed over has now been printed and distributed with the report. I ask that its consideration be now taken up.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6090) for the relief of Sidney Henderson, executrix of John Henderson, deceased.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Sidney Henderson, executrix of John Henderson, deceased, of Bradley County, Tennessee, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, for timber taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3522) for the relief of Sidney Henderson, executrix of John Henderson, deceased, submit the following report:

That a favorable report was made in this case, authorizing the Quartermaster-General to investigate the claim and report the facts to Congress for its action in the premises.

On March 14 the claim was recommitted to the committee with instructions to report the same back to the House within ten days with the amount that they think should be paid on said claim, and that when said report is made this claim shall not lose its place upon the Private Calendar, but shall be placed where it now stands for action by the House.

The committee have given the case careful consideration, and have come to the conclusion that $1,000 would be a fair price for the wood taken and used, and report herewith a bill, as a substitute, appropriating that amount, and recommend its passage.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill is not as much as I expected to get from the committee; but inasmuch as I had it referred back to the committee and they have unanimously reported in favor of this, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] when he proposes to move that the committee rise so that action may be taken by the House on the bills which have been laid aside to be favorably reported?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Not for a little while yet. I think we may go on in committee a little longer, especially as the evening session has been vacated.

JOHN P. GREGSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 257) for the relief of John P. Gregson.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amount involved in this bill is very small; still I would desire to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. TALBOTT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] who reported this bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs is at present engaged in the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It would perhaps be best to let the bill be passed over informally without losing its place.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. That order is made.

HEIRS OF LANGLEY B. CULLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1615) for the relief of the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley, a naval constructor in the Navy of the United States, the sum of $2,300, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in payment for all services now due the heirs of said Culley from the United States.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. TALBOTT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 1615):

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the heirs of Langley B. Culley, a naval constructor in the Navy of the United States, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

It appears by the records of the Navy Department that Langley B. Culley was appointed naval constructor by the late John Y. Mason, Secretary of the Navy, February 26, 1845, at a salary, as stated in his letter of appointment, of $2,300 per annum; and that said appointment was revoked by George Bancroft, who succeeded Mr. Mason as Secretary of the Navy, April 17, 1845, Mr. Culley having accepted the appointment in a letter dated February 26, 1845. It also appears that at the time of his appointment and acceptance of the office he owned and occupied a ship-yard in Baltimore, Md., where he was doing a successful business in the line of his profession; and in order to enter on the discharge of the duties of the office to which he had been appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, he sold out his ship-yard and sacrificed a flourishing business; and after holding himself in readiness for fifty days to obey the orders of the Navy Department, he was informed by the Secretary of the Navy that, in consequence of the failure of Congress to make an appropriation for the pay of the office to which he had been appointed, said appointment was revoked.

In the mean time his business arrangements had been broken up and his ship-yard had passed into other hands.

From the numerous statements which the committee have examined, all of which bear testimony to the high moral, intellectual, and professional abilities of Mr. Culley and of his eminent fitness for the position to which he had been appointed, and taking into consideration the sacrifices which he made in accepting said appointment, and for which neither he nor his heirs have received any compensation, the committee are unanimously of the opinion that his heirs are justly and equitably entitled to at least one year's pay at the rate named in his letter of appointment, and herewith report the accompanying bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to inquire of my friend from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] if the due measure of compensation here is not compensation at the rate of $2,300 per annum for the time this gentleman actually held the position to which he was appointed?

Mr. TALBOTT. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the facts in this case are clearly established by the records of the Navy Department. Mr. Culley was a man eminently qualified to be a naval constructor in the United States naval service. When he was appointed naval constructor he was at the time engaged in ship-building in Baltimore city. When he received his appointment he sold out his ship-yard and all the necessary tools and appliances for carrying on the business. He sold them out and they passed into other hands. He gave up his business entirely, expecting to be permanently in the service of the Government. The appointment was very shortly afterward revoked. In order to enter the service of the United States he had sacrificed a great deal more than the one year's pay would amount to. And this, in my judgment and the judgment of the Committee on Naval Affairs, is a very moderate compensation for him for sacrificing his entire business at his time of life to enter the service of the Government, and then being subjected to a violation, on the part of the Government, of the contract with him.

If, Mr. Chairman, this were a case between private individuals the person so treated would have his recourse in a court of law or equity, where he could show what damages he had sustained and recover them. I am not prepared to say how much consequential damages he could recover; but I am satisfied that in the case supposed any fair-minded juror in the land would have given him at least what this bill does—one year's pay.

This bill has been favorably reported by every committee that ever considered it. It passed this House in the last Congress and in the Forty-sixth Congress, and on both occasions failed in the Senate merely for want of time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Still I would be very glad if my friend would answer the question how long this gentleman was engaged in the service of the Government.

Mr. TALBOTT. To deal frankly with the gentleman I will say he was not engaged at all in the service of the Government, and he never received a cent from the date of his appointment until it was revoked. He did no service and received no pay. But, as I have said, he did sell out his business and accept the appointment tendered him by the Government. His letter is on file in the Navy Department. He received no pay, although he had sacrificed what was a living to himself and his family for the inducement held out by this appointment tendered to to him by the Government.

Mr. MCADOO. May I ask my colleague on the Committee on Naval Affairs a question?

Mr. TALBOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MCADOO. Can the gentleman state what was the cause of the revocation of that appointment?

Mr. TALBOTT. I think the failure of an appropriation to pay the salary was the real reason of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. That scarcely could have been the cause. Was it not a change of administration?

Mr. TALBOTT. That and a change of administration besides.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not this the case which is presented to us: a person is appointed to an office, and before he enters upon the duties of that office at all somebody else is appointed in his place? Is not that the case?

Mr. TALBOTT. He was appointed to this office and accepted the appointment. So far as the Government and Mr. Culley were concerned it was a completed transaction. He was appointed a naval constructor, accepted the appointment, and as long as there was no complaint he had a right to presume that he was in the employ of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would not the action proposed here be rather a perilous one in the way of a precedent? A person is appointed to an office with an indefinite term. Before he has served for a single year, yes, before he has served for a month, either because of some change in the administration or for some other cause, his appointment is revoked and another person is appointed in his place. Now, would it not be rather a dangerous precedent to hold that the Government in that case must be required to pay him a year's compensation?

Mr. MORSE. It would depend very much upon what the man sacrificed in accepting the office.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a matter for him to consider in accepting the office, but it is not a matter of public concern. The acceptance of the office is a voluntary act on his part, and he must run the risk.

I sympathize with my friend from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] in so far that this citizen seems to have sustained loss by his failure to get the office. But I am not able to perceive exactly the ground upon which the claim rests for the Government to pay him a year's compensation.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to say, in answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], that this man did not suffer loss in consequence of not obtaining the office, but in consequence of the Government not keeping its engagement with him.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would inquire of the gentleman from Maryland what time elapsed between the date of the appointment and the date of the revocation of the appointment?

Mr. TALBOTT. He was appointed on the 26th day of February, and the notice to him that the appointment had been revoked was not given until the 17th day of April, almost sixty days after the appointment. And in that time he had disposed of his business in order to enter upon the service of the Government.

This House has a right to treat this case exactly as it would a case between private individuals. As I have already said, if any private individual had violated a contract of this kind he could be made by law to give compensation to the individual for the loss sustained.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the committee had proposed as a measure of allowance to be given to this claimant compensation for sixty days, that would be one thing, and perhaps I might conceive that to be just. But it sets up another measure, and that is the loss which the claimant sustains in consequence of selling out his business. I think the committee should show that his business was a profitable one. Possibly it was a losing one and he made money by selling it.

To say the least of it, that is a very indefinite way of measuring the loss which any one has sustained. I might vote to pay this claimant for the sixty days' time during which he accounted himself in the service of the Government, but it is another thing entirely to set up some other measure, which I conceive to be a very indefinite one.

Mr. MORSE. Permit me to say that in a previous Congress I had this matter in charge. I made inquiry at the Department whether in their judgment it was proper that such a bill as this should pass, and I was informed that it was a proper bill to be passed. On that ground I made a favorable report upon the bill and it passed the House. That was two years ago. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. TALBOTT. In answer to just one point made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] let me say that the report in this case states, and the committee are warranted in making that report, that at the time Mr. Culley was appointed naval constructor he was doing a successful business in the city of Baltimore as a ship constructor or builder, and he disposed of that business in order that he might enter upon the service of the Government.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is another point. When an appointment is given to an officer or employé does the Government obligate itself thereby to continue that person in employment for any given length of time? Is it not at all times the option of the Government to discontinue that service? And did the Government in this case do anything more than it had the right to do, and what this person knew it had the right to do when he accepted the appointment? If the Government pays for the time which elapsed between the date of the appointment and the date of the revocation of the appointment, it seems to me it will pay all that this claimant has any right to expect.

Mr. MORSE. 'We do not deny your position.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question was decided in the affirmative—ayes 75, noes 23.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF CAPT. JOHN G. TOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1567) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Capt. John G. Tod, of the Texas navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the legal representatives of the late John G. Tod, of Texas, the sum of $12,500, the amount provided for a captain waiting orders in the United States Navy for the term of five years, in conformity with the provisions of section 12 of the act approved March 3, 1857, known as the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1858," which section reads as follows: "That the surviving officers of the Republic of Texas, who were duly commissioned as such at the time of annexation, shall be entitled to the pay of officers of the like grade, when waiting orders, in the Navy of the United States for five years from the time of said annexation; and a sum sufficient to make the payment is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the acceptance of the provisions of this act by any of said officers shall be a full relinquishment and renunciation of all claim on his part to any further compensation on this behalf from the United States Government to any position in the Navy of the United States;" and a sum sufficient to make said payment is hereby appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. As a number of bills which have already been reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole have not been acted upon, and as quite a number will be reported to-day, I move that the committee rise and report its action to the House, so that we may dispose of the bills which have been considered by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope the gentleman will not urge that motion. There are hundreds of claims on the Private Calendar. We have but one day in the week for their consideration, and then only five hours. If this House expects to give the least consideration to private claims, now is a good time to do it. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his motion.

Mr. MILLER. We ought not to give a day to claims of this kind.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then take your course like men; do not pretend to give relief without giving it. What would become of your pension claims if no consideration were given to private bills?

Mr. MILLER. They do not come up on this Calendar.

Mr. McMILLIN. No; but you would consider one class of claims and ignore all others.

Mr. MILLER. I would not consider such claims as have been before the House to-day.

Mr. McMILLIN. You have not opened your mouth against them.

Mr. MILLER. It is no use. If no person would fight them perhaps they would not pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] to the fact that the pending bill will probably give rise to discussion.

Mr. McMILLIN. If it does, let the discussion come. If the bill is discussed this evening it will not have to be discussed at another time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have already suggested that a number of bills heretofore reported from the Committee of the Whole are now on the Speaker's table awaiting the action of the House. They ought to be disposed of. I have suggested that those bills, with those already acted on in the Committee of the Whole to-day, will be enough to occupy the remainder of this day's session. That was my reason for making the motion that the committee rise. I insist upon that motion.

Mr. McMILLIN. And because I did not think there was enough business to consume in the House the whole remaining time of this day's session I resisted the gentleman's motion. The gentleman will remember that the order for a session this evening has been vacated, so that we need not close this afternoon's session so early.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HOLMAN that the committee rise, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report upon the bill now pending be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1567) for the relief of the legal representatives of Capt. John G. Tod, of Texas, report:

That after the failure of the treaty by which Texas was to have been annexed to the United States and the consummation of the annexation by resolution, much dissatisfaction existed among the citizens of Texas because of the failure to transfer the officers of the navy of Texas to the Navy of the United States, with rank and emoluments corresponding with rank and emoluments held and enjoyed by said officers in the navy of Texas, as was provided for in the inoperative treaty; and that as it was ascertained that such transfer was impossible of accomplishment by reason of that provision in the Constitution of the United States which imposes on the President the duty of appointing the officers of the Navy of the United States, Congress did, as compensation for the non-performance of the stipulations contained in said inoperative treaty, pass a law, approved March 3, 1857, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1858," the twelfth section of which act is as follows:

"That the surviving officers of the Republic of Texas, who were duly commissioned as such at the time of annexation, shall be entitled to the pay of officers of the like grade when waiting orders in the Navy of the United States, for five years from the date of said annexation; and a sum sufficient to make the payment is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the acceptance of the provisions of this act by any of the said officers shall be a full relinquishment and renunciation of all claims on his part to any further compensation on his behalf from the United States Government to any position in the Navy of the United States."

And that it has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States that the annexation of Texas to the Union was consummated on December 29, 1845; and that it was settled by the Court of Claims of the United States, in the case of E. M. Moore vs. United States (4 Nott & Huntington, p. 139), that "John G. Tod was a captain in the Texas navy at the time of annexation;" and that this decision of the Court of Claims is fully sustained by the commission of the said Capt. John G. Tod now on file in the Navy Department, signed by the president of the republic of Texas, dated July 12, 1845, more than five months prior to the date of annexation, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, a certified copy of which commission is on file with the committee. And that Capt. John G. Tod did, by his attorney, J. B. D. De Bow, a few weeks prior to the 10th day of June, 1857, file his claim with the Navy Department for five years' pay, as provided under the law of March 3, 1857, hereinbefore referred to; which proffer to accept the terms thereof did vest in the said Tod an immediate fixed right of present and future enjoyment of the benefit of said law.

And your committee further find that Capt. John G. Tod, some time in the latter part of the year of 1877, departed this life, leaving in Harris County, State of Texas, a wife and one son and one daughter, and that the county court of said Harris County, in said State of Texas, on the 8th day of October, 1877, ordered that letters of administration on the estate of John G. Tod be issued to Maggie G. Tod, as appears by a copy of said order and the letter of the attorney of the heirs on file with the committee.

And your committee find further that relief as prayed for under the bill referred has been afforded by act of Congress in like cases under the law hereinbefore referred to, as will appear by reference to the United States Statutes at Large, as follows:

Forty-third Congress, first session, page 608, chapter 403, "An act for the relief of the heirs at law of William C. Brashears, of the Texan navy;" Forty-fourth Congress, first session, page 454, chapter 209, "An act for the relief of Susan E. Rhea, widow of Dr. L. Burrows Gardiner."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that my friend from Georgia in the course of his remarks will inform us whether the papers upon which this claim is based were referred to the Secretary of the Navy; and, if so, what action was taken upon them?

Mr. BUCHANAN. My understanding is that the general appropriation made by Congress failed; and afterward payment of these claims was obtained by bills of a private nature. Commodore Moore was paid in this way. The Secretary of the Navy refused to pay his claim, and he came here afterward and invoked the action of Congress. Even in the last Congress interest was demanded on the amount of his claim, payment having been withheld for years. Commodore Moore, who has been paid, was an officer of the Texas navy, as Captain Tod was.

There are in this case only three questions to be considered. The first is as to this act of 1857. There can be no dispute about that. The Government of the United States passed this act to compensate all the officers of the Texas navy who were in commission at the time of annexation. Mr. Tod was a captain in the Texas navy at that time. A certified copy of his commission is on file here—certified by the Secretary of the Navy of the United States as being the commission of Capt. J. G. Tod. That commission was signed by the last president of the State of Texas, Anson Jones, on the 12th of July, 1845. The Supreme Court determined that annexation took place on the 26th of December, 1845. Consequently Captain Tod was an officer of the Texas navy in commission nearly six months prior to the annexation, and bore the rank of captain at the date of annexation. Now what other question is there to be determined?

Mr. HOLMAN. The question which I wished to put to the gentleman was whether these papers had been referred to the Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of ascertaining the facts and why the claim has not been paid before if the circumstances justified payment?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The whole facts are fully set out in the report of the Secretary of the Navy. There is a large amount of papers, which I did not deem it necessary to have printed. Every fact required to be proved under the act of 1857 is there set out in full. The letters of administration on the estate of Captian Tod are there, and every other paper requisite to prove his right under the act of 1857.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I understood the report correctly there are one or two matters which I should like to call to the gentleman's attention.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Commitee of the Whole House had had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 4971) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiences in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which concurrence was requested.

CAPT. JOHN G. TOD.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1567) for the relief of the legal representatives of Capt. John G. Tod.

Mr. BUCHANAN resumed the floor.

Mr. McADOO. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia whether the other officers of the Texas navy having the like status of Capt. John G. Tod have ever been relieved?

Mr. BUCHANAN. This case has been before Congress for years, and every time a favorable report has been made on it both in the House and in the Senate. They had to go before the Supreme Court to establish their right under the act of March 3, 1857, and from that day to this no officer has obtained his rights except through private bills passed for their relief in each case.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend from Georgia explain whether or not this officer after the annexation of Texas rendered any service.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Where?

Mr. HOLMAN. Anywhere.

Mr. BUCHANAN. To the United States Government?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. None of them were received into the United States Navy, and that is what they complained of. As it was ascertained that such transfer was impossible of accomplishment by reason of that provision in the Constitution of the United States which imposes upon the President the duty of appointing officers of the Navy of the United States, Congress did, as compensation for the non-performance of the stipulations contained in said inoperative treaty, pass a law, approved March 3, 1857, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1858." That act of March 3, 1857, was passed as part compensation for their not having been transferred to the United States Navy; but the appropriation made by the act of 1858 was not paid out. There were questions which went before the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court decided in the case of Commodore Moore that the annexation of Texas to the Union was consummated December 29, 1845, and under the law the surviving officers of the Republic of Texas who were duly commissioned as such at the time of annexation were entitled to the pay of an officer when awaiting orders in the Navy of the United States.

There is nothing else to be determined here but whether John G. Tod was a captain of the Texas navy on or before December 29, 1845. That is the whole question there is to be determined here. We have here a certified copy of his commission, purporting to be signed by Anson Jones, the last president of Texas, and countersigned by the proper authorities. It is certified by the Secretary of the Navy that that commission is on file in the Navy Department.

Mr. MCADOO. I should like to know whether the other officers of the Texas navy of the like status have been relieved.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not know whether they have all been relieved or not, but I presume they have.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will allow me a moment in order to get a proper understanding of this matter. The act under which this claim is made is that of the 30th of June, 1858.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; the act was passed March 3, 1857.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the act making the appropriation?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The act making the appropriation for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1858, was passed March 3, 1857.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes. Now let me read the twelfth section of that act:

> That the surviving officers of the republic of Texas, who were duly commissioned as such at the time of annexation, shall be entitled to the pay of officers of the like grade when waiting orders in the Navy of the United States, for five years from the date of said annexation; and a sum sufficient to make the payment is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the acceptance of the provisions of this act by any of the said officer shall be a full relinquishment and renunciation of all claims on his part to any further compensation on his behalf from the United States Government to any position in the Navy of the United States.

My friend sees this was an unlimited appropriation covering the whole ground. Why, then, under this ample power was not this officer paid?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand the Secretary of the Navy refused to pay any of them. Now, in the case of E. M. Moore the money was paid, and paid under the provisions of a bill like this which passed in his behalf.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman state the ground of refusal on the part of the Secretary? Do the papers show the ground of his refusal?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think so.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do they show why the Secretary of the Navy declined to make the payment?

Mr. BUCHANAN. An examination of this report shows that relief has been granted in some of these cases by Congressional action. All of these have been paid in this way: In the Forty-third Congress, the first session, page 608, chapter 403, will be found an act for the relief of the heirs at law of William C. Brashears, of the Texas navy. That is one of the cases. Commodore Moore, as he is called, or Captain Moore, was relieved in the same way. In the Forty-fourth Congress, at the first session, page 454, chapter 209, appears the act for the relief of Susan E. Rhea, widow of Dr. L. Burrows Gardiner. He was a surgeon in the Texas navy.

Mr. HOLMAN. But will the gentleman from Georgia state the grounds on which the Secretary of the Navy refused to pay? There was an ample appropriation of money and directions to pay it. Why, therefore, was it not paid?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART], who is more familiar with that point than myself, and he will give the gentleman the information.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in regard to this matter I wish to make an explanation so that my friend from Indiana and others may understand the merits of this case. Texas, as is well known, was annexed to the United States by a joint resolution passed by Congress in 1845, the terms of which were accepted by the republic of Texas.

In that joint resolution passed by Congress it was provided that the republic of Texas should cede to the United States all public property, such as fortifications, barracks, ports, harbors, navy and navy-yards, docks, magazines, armaments, &c. Under the terms of that resolution it was the understanding of the government of Texas that her naval officers were to be included—that by the term "navy" her officers of that service were also embraced, and were to be provided for by the Government of the United States. But a different construction was placed upon that language by the United States Government. This Government held that it only meant its ships and munitions of war, and did not include its officers. Thereupon ensued a controversy between the State of Texas and the United States which lasted a number of years. Finally the matter was determined by an act of Congress, to which the gentleman from Georgia has already referred.

One section of that act provides:

> That the surviving officers of the Republic of Texas, who were duly commissioned as such at the time of annexation, shall be entitled to the pay of officers of the like grade when waiting orders in the Navy of the United States, for five years from the date of said annexation; and a sum sufficient to make the payment is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the acceptance of the provisions of this act by any of the said officers shall be a full relinquishment and renunciation of all claims on his part to any further compensation on his behalf from the United States Government to any position in the Navy of the United States.

Now, the question arose in regard to Captain Tod as to whether he was or was not a captain in the Texas navy. I do not now remember who was the Secretary of the Navy at that time, but because Commodore Moore, as we term him in Texas, or Captain Moore, applied under the provisions of that act, it was thought that Captain Tod was not an officer of the Texas navy at that time for reasons which I shall presently show. Captain Tod then, although he made his application under this act and complied with its provisions so far as he could do it, was refused payment because of the controversy that then arose as to whether he was or was not a captain.

That question has, however, since been judicially determined. I say that he was a captain. We have his commission, as you have been informed by the gentleman from Georgia, on file in the Navy Department, a commission issued months before the annexation of Texas took place. I do not remember the exact time, but some considerable time before annexation.

In the case of Moore vs. The United States the Court of Claims, in delivering the opinion, say:

> We think that there was a clear mistake made in the construction given to this act of Congress. We think from the evidence laid before us that there was a mistake of facts. The evidence shows that there was another person, John G. Tod, who held a position in the same navy with the rank of captain.
> This claim has been——

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there anything further in regard to Captain Tod in that decision of the Court of Claims to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. The question, I will state, in order that the matter may be clearly understood, that was raised in that case was whether Commodore Moore was a post captain. I believe it is called a senior captain, in the navy; and in determining that question the court adverted to the fact that there was another captain in the Texas navy in the person of Capt. John G. Tod.

This claim, I will say, has been often before Congress——

Mr. HISCOCK. If there had been two captains, under the terms of the joint resolution both would have been entitled to pay if both were commissioned?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Yes, sir; Moore being a post-captain, I believe you term it. But both were commissioned.

This claim has been before Congress on favorable reports from three or, I believe, four committees, and also on reports from committees of the Senate—all favorable reports; and the reason that it has never been determined before is that it has never yet been reached on the Calendar until this time. I believe that it is as fair and just a claim as ever came before Congress. Captain Tod was known in Texas not only as an efficient officer, but really he was the father of the Texas navy. The Texas navy, it is true, was a very small affair. It was composed of, I believe, but three or four vessels. The army of Texas was but a small affair too. But the Texas navy was of sufficient force to sweep Mexican commerce from the Gulf and to render efficient aid in establishing the independence of the republic of Texas. And no man in that strife made greater sacrifices or contributed more than John G. Tod, whose heirs now come before this Congress and ask that you in good faith shall do what you promised to do in the act of 1857.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BUCHANAN] that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that it is time for the committee to rise.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The next bill on the Calendar I think would not give rise to any discussion. But as gentlemen around me seem to insist on it, I will move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had the Private Calendar under consideration, had directed him to report to the House with favorable recommendations sundry bills, some with and some without amendments.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with amendments, were severally considered, the amendments agreed to, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1965) granting a pension to John A. Crozier;

A bill (H. R. 351) authorizing the muster-in and discharge of Henry Z. Blinn; and

A bill (H. R. 3932) directing the Adjutant-General of the United States Army to place the name of James M. Thomas on the muster-rolls of Company C, Second Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry, and for other purposes.

The following bill, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 6090) for the relief of Sidney Henderson, executrix of John Henderson, deceased.

GENERAL W. W. AVERELL.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2487) authorizing the retirement of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general. The bill was reported with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move to recommit that bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. There is a substitute reported by the Committee of the Whole. The first question is upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the committee. Pending that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DIBRELL. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 36.

Mr. DIBRELL. I do not ask for further count.

The SPEAKER. No further count is demanded.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, Mr. Speaker; it is.

The negative vote was counted, and there were—noes 62.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I wish to make the point of no quorum unless a yea-and-nay vote is agreed to.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I consent to a yea-and-nay vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. That is all right.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I withdraw the demand for further count on the understanding that there will be a yea-and-nay vote on the passage of the bill. I want it understood that the House gives unanimous consent to that agreement.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am sure there will be no objection to that on this side.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the yea-and-nay vote should be taken on the motion to recommit.

Mr. CALKINS. The agreement has been made now that it shall be taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COSGROVE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COSGROVE. Has the result of the vote been announced by the Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It has been; but the point was made that a quorum had not voted. The point as to a quorum, as the Chair understood, was subsequently withdrawn on the condition that there will be a yea-and-nay vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed the understanding was the yea-and-nay vote should be on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Very well; then let us have the yeas and nays now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be agreed that the yeas and nays shall be ordered on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] calls for the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit the bill.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays, the affirmative vote being counted, there were ayes 29—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Count the other side.

The negative vote was counted, and there were noes 64.

The SPEAKER. The affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote, the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Will the Chair state on what question the yeas and nays are ordered?

The SPEAKER. On the motion to recommit the bill and amendment to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN. Would it be proper to inquire the purpose in moving to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. That would not be a proper question for the Chair to answer.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose the motion is made for the purpose of defeating the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 49, nays 126, not voting 146; as follows:

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary.

Mr. CALKINS. I withdraw my vote, and announce myself as paired with my colleague Mr. MATSON.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported from the Committee of the Whole, as follows:

The substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the Journal. [After a pause.] The gentleman's name is recorded in the affirmative upon the Journal, and it will be corrected accordingly.

The Journal as corrected was approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of moving that the House proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the regular order of business, which cuts off all unanimous consent.

Mr. BELFORD. I understood a demand for the regular order of business was made some time last week, and yet the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] was permitted to pass a bill by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state what transpired on that occasion?

Mr. BELFORD. I wish to say one word more. I know, Mr. Speaker, you are absolutely just and absolutely impartial, but I do appeal to gentlemen to let us have a few minutes when we can proceed to the consideration of the bills upon the Speaker's table, which are local in their character but nevertheless of absolute importance. I appeal to my friend from Missouri to allow me to take from the Speaker's table a Senate bill, purely applicable to educational purposes in my State, and put it on its passage at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is the demand for the regular order of business withdrawn?

Mr. BLAND. I made the demand for the regular order of business in good faith, and hope it will be proceeded with.

Mr. BELFORD. I give notice, Mr. Speaker, that no more bills shall pass by unanimous consent during this session of Congress.

REDUCTION OF LIFETIME OF A PATENT.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Patents, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 3617) to reduce the lifetime of a patent to five years; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. VANCE. I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Patents, submitted the following report:

This bill (H. R. 3617) proposes to amend section 4884 of the Revised Statutes by striking out the word "seventeen" and inserting the word "five," and thereby make a most radical and unjust change in the patent laws of this country, its effect being to limit the life of a patent to five years. Such a change is not consistent with the spirit of our Constitution and laws made for the benefit and encouragement of inventors, and would be an act of gross injustice to the great mass of inventors of this country, who have done so much to develop the growth, wealth, and prosperity of the country. As to the right of property which the inventor has in his inventions, a recent and learned writer on patent law says: "The right of property which an inventor has in his invention is excelled in point of dignity by no other property right whatever." Contrasted with him who acquires property by inheritance or devise, contrasted with him who acquires property by marriage or donation, contrasted with him who acquires property by revenue from the barter of merchandise or from the yield of money loaning, he who acquires property by invention, by bringing into being things which before were not, stands pre-eminently and confessedly on a higher foundation.

The same learned writer again remarks: "The inventor is not the pampered favorite or beneficiary of the Government or of the nation. The benefits which he confers are greater than those which he receives. He does not cringe at the feet of power nor secure from authority an unbought privilege. He walks everywhere erect, and scatters abroad the knowledge which he created. He confers upon mankind a new means of lessening toil or of increasing comfort, and what he gives can not be destroyed by use or be lost by misfortune. It is henceforth an indestructible heritage to posterity. On the other hand, he receives from the Government nothing which costs the Government or the people a dollar or a sacrifice. He receives nothing but a contract, which provides that for a limited time he may exclusively enjoy his own."

The committee are unanimously of the opinion that the present limit of seventeen years is a reasonable limit, and therefore recommend that the accompanying bill do not pass.

Mr. ANDERSON. Instead of being laid upon the table, I ask that that bill be referred to the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public service, the following information, namely:

What action has been taken by the Government of the United States and of Venezuela, and by each and either of said governments, under the joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress approved March 3, 1883, entitled "A joint resolution providing for a new mixed commission, in accordance with the treaty of April 25, 1866, with the United States of Venezuela;" and especially that the President communicate to the House what claim is made by the said Government of Venezuela, or by its representatives, in regard to the effect of the said joint resolution upon the said treaty and upon the force and validity of the awards heretofore made under said treaty of April 25, 1866, and whether said Government of Venezuela is in any way delaying or declining to make payments upon the said awards or to further proceed in respect of the validity of such awards or of any or either of them; and also that he communicate to this House a statement of the amount of moneys paid in under the said awards and the date of the last payment, what amount has been distributed, and why further distributions have not been made; and that he transmit to the House copies of all correspondence between the two governments in relation to said treaty and awards since the said 3d of March, A. D. 1883.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the resolution, introduced by Hon. THOMAS M. BROWNE, requesting the President of the United States to furnish certain information in regard to Venezuelan claims, which is explained by the said resolution, has had the same under consideration, and has instructed me to report that the information requested is of sufficient importance to warrant a compliance with the request. The committee therefore present a favorable report and recommend the passage of the resolution.

PAYMENT OF TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. REAGAN in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, before I take up my argument where I left off on Thursday evening when the House adjourned, I propose to reply briefly to the proposition asserted by the gentleman from Missouri that the Government had no use for this money. He says a large surplus lies idle in the Treasury of the United States. This House recently sent a resolution of inquiry, and in answer to that the Secretary claimed there was some statutory provision under which he held every portion of what may be called the permanent surplus. The reply of the Secretary is Executive Document No. 110, I believe, and to be found in the folding-room. It appears that he holds what may be called the permanent fund in accordance with what he conceives to be the requirements of the law; a portion of it for the redemption of greenbacks, another portion for the redemption of silver and gold certificates, and other parts for other purposes he specifies; and so he goes on to show at length why it is that he holds this large balance. Whatever we may think of it, this has been and is the policy of the present Secretary.

It was the policy of his predecessor, Secretary Windom, and the policy of his predecessor, Secretary SHERMAN, to hold this large fund in reserve. But the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury show us that leaving this permanent fund untouched, whenever money comes in over and above the demands of the sinking-fund, interest on the public debt, and expenses of the Government, that money is applied to the reduction of the debt of the United States. The debt was reduced by many millions during the last year—I have not the figures before me—and if we get a surplus the present year from whisky or elsewhere, that will likewise be applied to the reduction of the debt. I should like to see that debt reduced as fast as possible, and I want to get all the money that is in sight into the Treasury and paid out on the debt. So much in answer to that argument.

Now, to resume where I left off. I think I succeeded in showing on Thursday evening that the distiller in asking for special legislation before this Congress does not occupy as favorable a position as the ordinary tax-payer would if he were here asking for relief; because the distiller voluntarily assumed, knowing what the law was, the payment of these taxes when he undertook the business of a distiller. I also showed that every demand heretofore made for relief by this interest at the hands of Congress was based on the idea that there had been overproduction, and that every relief measure that was granted was followed by increased overproduction.

I further showed that the refusal of the Forty-seventh Congress to pass the relief act then asked for resulted in the curtailment of production. I now propose to show that it is only by holding distillers to the law that we can expect to equalize production and consumption and give these distillers themselves permanent relief by compelling them to do business on a sound basis. Let me advert briefly to the figures presented by these gentlemen themselves who advocate this bill. It was in 1878 that the three-year extension bill was passed, changing the law from one to three years for the payment of taxes on distilled spirits. As I have said, those who were applying for relief stated then they wanted it because of overproduction. Now, what followed? During that year, 1878—that fiscal year was then nearly closed, ending in June, while the act was passed in April, 1878—there were but 56,000,000 gallons made.

During the next year, 1879, there was an increase of 26 per cent. and over, the quantity made being 71,000,000 gallons. During the year 1880 there was a still further increase of 26 per cent., running the amount of production to 90,000,000 gallons. And at that time this other and further relief was granted—the release of interest on unpaid taxes. Gentlemen say that was but a trifling matter. It may have been, but it showed the disposition of Congress to grant what this interest demanded; and we see that trifling relief act followed by a still further increase of 30 per cent., the production running from 90,000,000 in 1880 up to 117,000,000 in 1881.

In 1882 application was made here for relief again. Again the complaint all over the country was overproduction. The bill passed this House. It went to the Senate, and there was discussed as it had not been here; and while it was there suspended, undergoing that discussion, in the latter part of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress there was a decrease in production, which fell off from 117,000,000 the proceding year to 105,000,000 in 1882. But the Forty-seventh Congress finally refused to grant any relief whatever, and the consequence was that in 1883, the fiscal year ending June 30 last, the production had fallen down to 74,000,000; and we are informed that there is a still further falling off during the first half of the present year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, does any gentleman here believe that if the bill in 1882 which passed this House, or even a bill such as was finally matured in the Senate, giving two years' extension, had passed both Houses of Congress and become a law, we should to-day have only the amount on hand that we have? Would not the granting of relief the third time have been followed by increased production? Would not the same result have followed a relief act then that followed each relief act before?

Why, sir, the very argument, as I said before, upon which was based the demand for relief was that distillers ought not to be compelled to close their distilleries; that they ought to be allowed to go on and furnish a market for corn, to go on fattening hogs and producing and increasing the amount of whisky on hand, which is the very burden of which they complain. It has been said that the distillers themselves saw this storm coming and for prudential considerations they should have curtailed the production of whisky, even if Congress had granted the relief asked in 1882. It seems, however, looking at the past, that the only thing which opened their eyes was the refusal of Congress at last to listen to their demands.

Did I say "open their eyes?" I beg pardon, Mr. Chairman; their eyes were open all the time. They knew all the time and they so constantly represented here that they had overproduced. Still they kept on overproducing, and it was only the strong arm of the law, or rather, I should say, the refusal of Congress to change the law in their behalf, which brought down the production. If that relief act had been passed in 1882, two years ago, the distillers to-day would have had still more whisky in stock; and, now that the two years is about expiring, they would have been here clamoring for relief, backed up by more arguments, backed up by more people, backed up by more whisky than to-day.

How is it, then? If two years ago there was no demand at home and no demand abroad sufficient to take up all the whisky in store, then I ask, and I wish gentlemen to answer me, how the distillers ever expected to get down to a sound basis except by curtailing production? They certainly could not do it by again opening their distilleries, for every single gallon that was made would simply aggravate the situation, and would only tend toward where the passage of this bill would tend—an eventually overwhelming demand for the repeal of the whole tax on whisky. Sir, if we have not the power to-day, under present circumstances, to compel these people to comply with the law, will we have the power when we shall have granted relief act after relief act? And when this overproduction shall have gone on constantly increasing, will we have the power then to deny the distillers when they ask for a total repeal of the tax?

For one I should like to get rid of this whisky tax and the tobacco tax, because they are both inquisitorial. But I do not believe we can do it now, unless we put duties on tea and on coffee, and higher duties on sugar, on tin plate, and on other necessaries of life. I do not believe we can pay the expenses of the Government, pay off the war debt or pay the interest on it, and carry on the Government without adding to the present tariff duties. I am certain that if we should repeal the whisky tax we should have no opportunity to lessen war-tariff taxation for many years to come. And whenever it comes to a question of furnishing cheap whisky to able-bodied men or cheap clothing and cheap necessaries of life to women and children, I shall not hesitate a moment in my choice. I will pile up the price on whisky and put down the price on the necessaries of life.

One of the arguments made here is that it is not the distillers alone who are asking this relief. That is so. I have before me a table which was alluded to the other day by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS]. It was used in the last Congress, in the arguments on this question in the Senate, by Senator BECK. It shows that the bourbon and rye whisky produced by twenty different distilleries in the State of Kentucky was owned at that time in thirty-four different States and Territories. What does that prove? It proves, in the first place, that the owners of this whisky instead of being few are many. It proves, also, that they have more political power than whisky would have if it were concentrated in the hands of a few individuals.

When I speak of the political power which whisky has I hope gentlemen will not misunderstand me. I do not mean to impugn the motives of a single member on this floor. Neither do I mean that the whisky interest is corrupting or attempting to corrupt this body. I do not believe it is; I am sure it would not do it; and I thank God for the assurance in my own mind that it could not do it even if it would.

But here is the way this political power is wielded. Every morning when we come here we find fresh pamphlets on our desks. The latest issue is one I hold here: "Dispatches to WILLIAM R. MORRISON, urging the passage of the bonded whisky extension bill," coming from Kentucky, Illinois, Nebraska, and elsewhere, from bankers and other business men who are interested in this whisky question. Why are they interested in it? Because they have advanced money upon it; they bought it while it was in bond.

If gentlemen will consider for a moment they will see that it is to the interest of the dealer when he sells whisky to have it still in bond under the Government lock and key, for then the Government stands sponsor for its purity. This whisky then is held by persons all over the country, and thus the interest is diffused far and wide.

Therefore, when men in Cincinnati and Louisville and Chicago and Omaha and in New York telegraph here that they are in distress, when they represent their hardships to their members, as a matter of course their members listen.

That is the mode in which whisky manifests its political power. It is owned all over the country by influential men, men of money and brains and men who control other men.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that instead of there being on hand the present amount of whisky some 64,000,000 gallons of bourbon and rye on the 1st day of January this year there were in Government warehouse 264,000,000 gallons; that is to say, suppose that the amount now held was trebled and quadrupled and held by people all over the Union; how much power would that interest have here to-day?

Why, sir, the demand would be overwhelming; and, without any regard whatever to other questions of taxation, it could not be resisted.

Gentlemen may say that even if the surplus of whisky were treble what it is distillers and owners would not ask the tax to be repealed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HERBERT. I would like very much to have ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman's time will be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. HERBERT. I am much obliged to the committee for its courtesy, and I will hasten on.

I believe it would be to the interest of the owners of this article if they found themselves encumbered with a large amount of it to demand the repeal of the tax. Why? Because they would say if the tax were taken off they would be able to furnish cheap whisky to the people; that if whisky were cheap more people would buy it, and thus the dealers would have a market. This will be the result unless we take our stand firmly now and compel these people to comply with the law.

But gentlemen have argued here that an invidious distinction is made against persons engaged in this business; that the owners of tobacco are entitled to keep it in bond until they see proper to sell it or enter it for consumption. In reply to this argument it has been shown here by the gentleman from Georgia that tobacco does not stay long in bond; that self-interest prompts the owners of it to put it upon the market. The case is the same with beer.

I come now to the last proposition. The whisky men assert, in order to show that the law does not deal with them fairly, the argument in reference to imports. As has been stated, the distiller of whisky to-day is in a better condition than the importer of merchandise, because under our law if imported goods are not entered for consumption within twelve months the importer must after that, if he puts them on the market within two years, pay an additional 10 per cent.; whereas the whisky dealer or owner has three whole years within which to seek a market, and not one dime of penalty is charged against him during that time.

But I desire to show that practically this privilege of importing goods, then exporting them, and then reimporting them again, to avoid duties, is never resorted to. I refer gentlemen to the reports of exports and imports of foreign merchandise.

The figures, as I have them in my mind, show that our imports of dutiable goods for 1883 amounted to $532,000,000, and the amount of dutiable goods exported was $9,000,000. In other words, only 1.8 per cent. of the dutiable goods imported were exported; and it will be found that a corresponding amount of non-dutiable goods, $9,000,000, was also exported from the ports of the United States during the same period. The same reason must apply in one case as in the other. In the first place, a great many of these goods were imported not to be sold in the American market but to make up a cargo. This remark applies to dutiable and non-dutiable goods alike. Secondly, a portion of these goods, dutiable and non-dutiable, may have been imported to try this market, and after trying it unsuccessfully they were exported in order to try the foreign market.

It can not be shown that any appreciable proportion of these imported goods which were subsequently exported ever enjoyed the inestimable privilege which it is contended is denied to the distillers, the privilege of laying in bond for three years, trying this market for three years, and then paying port charges and transportation to a foreign port and transportation back again, in order to try again that same unsuccessful market. The contention of the whisky men in this, as in every case, to show that others have advantage of them in the law, is absolutely without foundation. I think, sir, I have shown that every argument by which gentlemen have undertaken to sustain this claim on the ground of an invidious distinction against those engaged in making distilled spirits is without a shadow of foundation.

It is said that in England distilled spirits are allowed to remain in bond for an unlimited time. My understanding is that the English law is the same with respect to imported goods. If I am correct in this understanding, the system of an unlimited bonded period applies there to imported goods as well as to articles manufactured in the kingdom. The English system is one and the same for both classes of articles, and our system ought to be and is the same for both.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the whisky men, having passed through as they have some suffering, having had some failures, ought not to want to go back and retrace that ground. All interests have failures. Whatever the law might have been some distillers would have failed just as some men in every other branch of business have done. I have here a table from Bradstreet giving the number of failures during the recent week as two hundred and eleven, and in the corresponding weeks of 1883, 1882, and 1881 the failures were respectively two hundred and thirty-three, one hundred and forty, and one hundred and thirty-three. Thus we see that even during the flush times of 1881 there were in one week one hundred and eighty-three failures, and few if any of them were in the whisky business. This table shows that, as everybody knows, failure is incident to every mercantile occupation in the country.

Because gentlemen can point to failures in Louisville and Cincinnati among whisky dealers, and can urge there are likely to be failures in the future if we do not grant relief, shall we open these distilleries again? Shall we encourage distillers to go on to overproduction which will but aggravate the situation? It seems to me that would be unwise legislation. I do not think that sound policy.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go home to my constituents, to the farmers, to the merchants, to the professional men, to the mechanics, and say to them, "We have granted special legislation for the benefit of the whisky men and have done nothing for you."

Why, sir, there is no interest in this country that is not subject to great losses by the rise and fall of prices; and that, after all, is what the whisky people are here complaining of. A fall of 10 cents a bushel in wheat often costs the producers of that article a loss of more than $40,000,000, a fall of 1 cent a pound on cotton frequently causes the cotton growers to lose $30,000,000, and so I might go on through the whole list of the great industries of this country. The honest toilers who are engaged in these industries ask no special relief at your hands. They suffer, and must suffer, from any fall in prices, and they can not see, and I can not see, why distillers should not do the same. Whisky dealers, like other people, must take the chances of trade. But, sir, whisky dealers and owners are now on the road to a sound business basis; they must not turn back. They are beginning to curtail production because the law compels them, like other men, to pay taxes when they are due. Let us hold them to the law, and we will have them before us no more threatening panics to secure legislation.

But, sir, as I said, the refusal to pass this bill would be better for the owners of whisky than to pass it—better for them as well as for the country. If we pass the bill and start the distilleries again no one can tell how much whisky will be produced or where the end will be to overproduction. So no one will buy except for immediate consumption. But if we defeat this bill dealers will see, capital will understand, that we will not by loose and vicious legislation start the distilleries again, that overproduction is at an end, and that the supply on hand will soon be taken up, that there is never to be a better opportunity to buy cheap old and ripe whiskies than now, and so they will buy up the stock on hand.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLAY. I take it, sir, the questions proposed by this bill should be treated by this Congress on the basis of fairness and justice to all parties concerned. I take it there is no moral or religious question connected with the bill, and there should be none in the discussion of the questions connected with it; and there will be none unless my colleague, on the other side of the House, from the State of Kentucky [Mr. WHITE], should deem it necessary to lug into this discussion some of his temperance proclivities and great moral ideas.

It is claimed by the friends of this bill, Mr. Chairman, that it is in the interest of a great class of manufacturers who have grown up, who have paid over a thousand millions of dollars into the public Treasury to defray the expenses of this Government, who have in every particular conformed to the law under which they were created, and who are as great lovers of the country as any class of citizens under its control.

Why legislation should not be had in their interest, why they should not be protected when protection is demanded, is answered by some with the narrowness which usually follows a narrow mind—that it is the article of whisky, and because the sale of it and the consumption of it are evils, therefore it deserves no consideration at the hands of this Congress. I claim, no matter what the individual members may believe on that subject, that it is an article of commerce, that it is made legitimate by the Government, and that it demands alike the protection which the Government would give to any other article of commerce or any other business or avocation in the country.

It is claimed by those opposed to the bill that it is class legislation, that it is special legislation, and on that ground, therefore, no action should be taken by this Congress in regard to the matter.

Is it class legislation, Mr. Chairman? Several years ago while the nation was in great distress it was deemed necessary to inaugurate the system of internal revenue for the purpose of aiding the Government in the great crisis which was then about to occur or in the great war which was then in existence. Taxes were levied under that system on numerous articles produced and in existence among the people of the United States. The subjects of taxation that now remain are whisky, beer, and tobacco, the other subjects of taxation under that system having been long since abolished.

Now, the tax on beer is not paid until the article enters into consumption; the tax on tobacco is not paid until that article enters into consumption; but the tax on whisky under the law is required to be paid before the article enters into consumption or is placed upon the markets of the country. Instead, then, of being special legislation, it is for the purpose of making the law general in its character and repealing as far as possible the special provisions by which whisky is made to pay a tax of from 400 to 500 per cent. more than its intrinsic value before entering on consumption, when under the internal-revenue system no other article pays such tax until it enters into consumption. In order that the law may be made general the necessity exists that this special legislation should be had; that whisky should be placed on the same footing as tobacco and beer.

It is claimed that it is in the interest of a monopoly. How in the interest of a monopoly? It is claimed that small distillers would be shut out of the market and large distillers would have control of it.

How, Mr. Chairman, could this possibly be the case? On the contrary, if the amount of whisky which is now in bond is thrown upon the market it must come in competition with the smaller distillers equally as much as with the large ones, and the small distiller would be compelled to sell the product of his still in competition with the large one. Therefore there is nothing which can properly in this regard bring this within the term "monopoly." And it is not a monopoly in Kentucky, although Kentucky is the largest manufacturer of the article. The right to manufacture is not alone given to Kentucky. It is given to every State in the Union and to every individual citizen of the United States as well as it is given to the State of Kentucky and to her citizens. All have the right to engage in the manufacture of it. Wherever corn or rye are grown, wherever water percolates in the United States, whisky can be manufactured. But because, forsooth, certain citizens of the State of Kentucky have found in that manufacture more profit than they could find in any other branch of business and have hence engaged in it, is no reason why it should be considered a monopoly. But then the bill is not in the interest of the distillers of Kentucky alone. It is in the interest of the whole commercial world. It is in the interest of every business in the whole country, because if you strike at any one of the great interests of the country you indirectly attack all. Our interests and prosperity are so blended that when injury is done one it affects each and every other. Kentucky owns but a small quantity of the whisky that is now in bond in that State. The State of Ohio owns more than Kentucky; the State of Massachusetts owns more than Kentucky; the State of New York owns more than Kentucky. The whisky that is now in bond in the State of Kentucky is held and owned by individual citizens throughout the United States, and they are calling upon you, not to relieve them on account of the original plant in the manufacture, not to prevent a failure on account of their investment, but to relieve them against an excise tax which is 500 per cent. more than the value of the original plant.

If it were a business proposition addressed to business men, could they for a moment fail or refuse to grant relief, is the question. I ask, Mr. Chairman, this question: If there was a debtor who owed a large sum of money, and that debtor should go to his creditor and ask him to relieve him temporarily by granting an extension upon his indebtedness, guaranteeing to him the amplest security, providing him with the most abundant security—I say, if he were to ask an extension of time under such circumstances as are here presented, would the creditor, if he had the ability to grant the extension for a solitary moment, refuse the request? Most assuredly not, I answer, and I am confident that there is no one so bold as would gainsay it.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Suppose that request that the gentleman now suggests to be coupled with the further proposition on the part of the debtor that his creditor should go on lending him money to any extent he might ask. What would you think of that?

Mr. CLAY. I would think, I will answer in reply to the gentleman from Maine, that if the creditor should grant an extension that would entirely cut him out of his debt, that would be injudicious and unwise on the part of the creditor, and it is a request to which he would not be likely to yield. But I say further to the gentleman from Maine that there is no possible chance of such a thing happening in this case.

Mr. REED. But, if the gentleman will pardon me, there is no limit, as I understand it, to the amount of whisky a man can put into a warehouse.

Mr. CLAY. There is no limit, it is true, to the amount of whisky a man can put into a warehouse; but do these gentlemen pretend to say that the granting of such an extension would prevent the creditor from collecting his claim when it became due?

Mr. REED. But let me say to the gentleman from Kentucky that at the end of the time, instead of a claim of seventy millions, as now, there would probably be a claim of one hundred millions.

Mr. CLAY. Anything, of course, might be assumed as being possible or probable——

Mr. REED. I agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. CLAY. But I am dealing now with the question of fact. The gentleman from Maine is in the habit of going beyond in his opposition to questions on this point on this floor and indulging in speculation and probabilities. He endeavors to raise ghosts by which to scare away members of this House. There is no ghost in this, however.

Mr. REED. No; this a question of spirits only. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAY. They are spirits, it is true, but they are bourbon, and do not hurt like the ghosts that the gentleman is in the habit of dealing with.

Mr. REED. I do not agree with the gentleman there, either. I think they hurt considerably more than the other kind.

Mr. WILLIS. If my colleague will indulge me now for a moment I will say in response to the gentleman from Maine that if the gentleman will read this bill carefully he will find that it is limited in its operation to the number of gallons of whisky now in bond. It makes no provision nor will it take into consideration in the relief granted by it the whisky to be manufactured hereafter.

Mr. CLAY. Of course. I supposed the gentleman was familiar with the terms of the bill and had informed himself upon the subject. I deemed it scarcely necessary to make a reply to the suggestion that he made.

Mr. REED. But if the gentleman from Kentucky will pardon me, and I do not wish to interrupt him if it interferes with the course of his argument——

Mr. CLAY. Certainly, I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Kentucky was indulging in the supposition that if the man asked of his creditor an extension and gave him perfect security for the debt, would not the creditor on business principles be likely to grant it. Now, that is the case presented here, with this difference, that the debtor can go on incurring his debt for three years, piling up additional debts.

Mr. WILLIS. No, that is a mistake.

Mr. CLAY. The bill especially provides that this shall only refer to whisky now in bond, which was in bond on the 6th of December.

Mr. REED. But every gallon of whisky that is manufactured this year will have three years to stay in these warehouses.

Mr. CLAY. That is very true.

Mr. REED. And if the production should be increased from 70,000,000 gallons to 100,000,000 gallons, that would be 30,000,000 gallons more than the consumption of the country requires, and the distillers would run into debt to the Government in the amount of the tax on 30,000,000 gallons more.

Mr. CLAY. And what would the Government have then? The Government would have ample security for the payment of the tax on the increased production. For the Government has a lien upon the whisky itself in the first place. It has the bond with good security for the payment of the tax. In addition to those two things it has a lien upon the property of the distiller, including his machinery, his building, and any other property he may own; also his bonds or other securities, together with all the property of the sureties on the bond.

Mr. REED. But the gentleman's position is that to exact the payment of the tax on the 70,000,000 gallons liable to become due within the next two years will produce a financial difficulty. What will be the effect of demanding the tax that will in two years from now be due on 100,000,000 gallons? Why, of course, bigger financial difficulties.

Mr. CLAY. No, sir; that can not possibly be if distillers control themselves. And I will say to the gentleman in that regard that the high-wine and sour-mash distillers in the United States have met in convention and have agreed to reduce the production of the article. By that agreement the large distillers make only 20 per cent. of their capacity and the smaller distillers 33½ per cent. on the amount of their capacity. And year after year, instead of the production increasing under this proposed law it will diminish, and the Government will be finally in a better fix and the people who manufacture this article will be in a better fix. But I was going on to illustrate——

Mr. REED. If it does not interrupt the gentleman I should like simply to say that is not in the bill. On the contrary, I think I can show the reverse is in the bill.

Mr. CLAY. I admit that a few years ago when there was large prosperity in the country, under the idea the consumption would increase, notwithstanding the pendency of the extension bill at that time, distillers did go on and produce more than they had ever done before. That is true. The gentleman from Maine states it as a fact, and I concede it. But I say to him there is no disposition on the part of the distillers to do that again. The country was prosperous. They saw everything looking fair and they wanted to manufacture enough to supply the demand. From their great confidence in the future growth of the country, laboring under the belief that the prosperity of the country would demand a larger production, with large contracts outstanding for grain and large contracts for feeding cattle and hogs it is not surprising that overproduction ensued. They did not know that there was being manufactured more than would supply the demand. They thought they were doing that. But in their unwisdom they did more; they overproduced. That is an admitted fact. And now on account of that overproduction they come to you and ask this relief at your hands.

I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that no creditor would refuse to grant the extension. In this case can the Government refuse to grant the extension? As I remarked, it does not do away with a single part of the security it now possesses. The Government has a lien upon the manufactured article. It has a lien upon the property, personal, real, and mixed, if there be any, of the distiller; and in addition to that it has his bond with security approved by the officers of the Government, and in no event can the tax be lost. I say, if the creditor under such a state of things had the ability to grant this relief to his individual debtor there would be no question about it. The one question that remains is: Has this Government the ability to do it?

Why, sir, there are about one hundred and fifty millions of surplus in the Treasury which is of no use to any one, which is not drawing any interest. You propose to place in that Treasury in its present plethoric condition sixty-six millions more, drawing it from the channels of trade, retiring it where it bears no interest and is of no good to the people. The Government has the ability, because it has no use for the money. It receives when granting this extension 4½ per cent. interest upon the amount of the taxes when they fall due, which is equivalent to the highest rate of interest that the Government imposes on any part of its indebtedness.

It is urged again, as an objection to the bill, that the internal-revenue system ought to be abolished, and that this is the best mode of abolishing it. Mr. Chairman, I believe that that consideration is controlling members of this House more than any other. I admit that the internal-revenue system is bad. I admit that office-holders connected with it have produced more corruption and that the system itself is a greater source of corruption than almost anything else now known in the country. But I believe, while the system is wrong and while the office-holders should be dispensed with, some method not objectionable can be proposed and will be proposed by statesmanship to collect the tax from whisky and tobacco. I believe that those articles should bear the chief burdens of this Government. They are purely luxuries, and I believe the easiest mode to collect the revenue from the people of the country is by means of a tax paid by the consumers upon an article of luxury. The burden of such tax falls lightly upon the whole people. When the question is proposed to me to abolish the tax on whisky and tobacco, which goes wholly into the Federal Treasury, and levy indirectly the tax required for the support of the Government by way of tariff upon the necessaries of life, the greater part of which tax goes into the pockets of favored monopolists—the blanket, the coat, and hat of the poor man—then I say, as between the two, I am in favor of retaining the tax on whisky and tobacco and taking off from the necessaries of life the tax levied indirectly under a tariff law.

It was said by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] that customs duties are collected within a year after the articles enter the custom-house. That is true, except that the parties owning the goods have the privilege of exportation, and thereby they may acquire almost endless time for the payment of the duties. But the gentlemen forget that goods entering the custom-house go into a building owned by the United States and paid for by the money of the people in the Treasury. The bonded warehouse of the distiller is erected by him, paid for by his money, and is then placed under the control of the Government officer, and the individual distiller has no right to enter it except in company of the agent of the Government; no authority to carry the keys of the warehouse, and no power to do a single solitary thing in connection with that bonded warehouse without the consent and the authority of the agent of the Government. There is, then, a great difference in that respect.

But the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has been guilty in his speech of considerable inconsistency upon this question of customs duties and the right of the manufacturer of whisky to export his product. In one portion of his speech he says:

> They [the distillers] are not entitled to the privilege of exportation, because, as I have said, that privilege was intended as a great commercial policy.

He there denies to the distiller the right to export his whisky. Further along in the same speech he says:

> I know that generally they [the distillers] have the power to export it, and the Government can not get the tax if they see fit to avoid it by exportation. They are protected by the Constitution of the United States in that.

In one part of his speech he says they can export, and in another part he says they can not. I coincide with him in the first view, that the distillers can export their product. But I ask if this Congress is going to compel an interest of this kind to export to Cuba or to Canada at a cost of 8 or 10 per cent. on their product, when by granting this relief you can permit that product to remain within the borders of the United States and in the bonded warehouses of the country under the control of the Government? It is not right to compel them to export. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue says that if the questions arising under this bill grew out of or were connected with any other article than that of whisky, it never would for a moment be thought of.

This measure of relief has been indorsed heretofore by Congress; it has been indorsed by a former Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and is indorsed by the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue and by the Secretary of the Treasury. Last winter, at the other end of the Capitol, it was indorsed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. All these men, regardless of party (and there should be no partisan feeling in this matter), indorsed this simple measure of relief.

If Congress shall pass this bill it will prevent a financial crisis in the West, and particularly in my State. When you can grant the relief without detriment to the public interest, without in any way interfering with the necessities of the Government or with the payment of its debt, then I say to you gentlemen that in all fairness you should grant it.

I will yield the balance of my time to my colleague [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. THOMPSON. I would inquire how much time I will have?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON. The only interest which I have in this bill is that of my constituents, and which being very great, I think is a sufficient apology for what I have to say to the House to-day in advocacy of its passage. If I can receive the attention of members I hope to demonstrate that this is merely a plain business proposition, one which addresses itself entirely to the intelligence of the House, and one that I hope and believe will receive that intelligent consideration at the hands of a majority of this body to which, on account of its great importance, it is fairly entitled.

I do not believe that we will arrive at any proper conclusion on this question if we allow prejudice to influence us. Nor do I expect, although it came from a distinguished member of the Committee on Ways and Means, that the speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will have much weight in determining this business matter, for it was inspired by prejudice alone.

The proposition is simply this: whether or not the Governmont will by an enforced collection of this tax bankrupt one class of its citizens, when it does not require this money for any public purpose. I do not claim for the manufacturers of or dealers in this article that they are entitled to any more consideration at the hands of Congress than is any other class of our citizens. I was surprised to find the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] was unwilling to accord to them less than other people in this country asked and received. They are entitled to the same, no more.

These parties ask only a patient hearing of their case. They do not come, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] alleged, demanding the passage of this bill at the hands of this House. As I listened to the opening of his speech, I almost thought I could see the distillers and liquor dealers arrayed at the doors of this Hall, with artillery, cavalry, Gatling guns, and all the implements of modern warfare in their hands, sounding upon their bugles their demand of this House its unconditional surrender to do their bidding and obey their behest.

Have we any such picture as that presented to us? I hold in my hand the humble request of these people in the shape of a petition to Congress, a petition under the Constitution of your free country (which accords even to these men the right of petition), to grant them that relief to which they may show themselves entitled. They do not come here and demand anything. They petition Congress to grant them an intelligent consideration and a patient hearing in behalf of the bill which they have presented to this House. If upon that consideration you do not believe they are entitled to relief, if the facts which they present to you do not satisfy your judgment, looking at the matter from a business standpoint and the high plane of statesmanship to which you have been elevated, then you have the right to refuse it to them just as you would refuse it to any others, and they will retire from your halls, go into bankruptcy, and settle with their creditors as best they can.

I am sorry that my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] whom I now see before me was not satisfied with the number of bankrupts who have marched out in our State within the last year in consequence of the harsh policy which Congress has forced upon them. When my colleague [Mr. WILLIS] called his attention to that fact, and showed that in one city alone half a dozen firms have been forced into bankruptcy, the gentleman from Alabama replied, "Oh, nothing but a universal panic will induce me to consider for one moment the proposition to grant relief to these parties."

The bankruptcy of a single State is not sufficient for him; there must be universal ruin before any relief should be granted. Mr. Chairman, I hope and believe that there are few men in this House whose prejudices are so strong that it requires universal bankruptcy before relief can be granted. If relief is to come only on that condition it will come too late, because then the men interested in this branch of business will be already ruined, and there will be no one left to relieve.

The men interested in this measure come to you for an intelligent consideration of this bill. I know they have been here before. But they are not criminals at the bar. The gentleman from Georgia treats them as if they were criminals. He prosecutes them here as if in the manufacture of whisky and its storage in bonded warehouses they were guilty of some high crime deserving the condemnation of the House, instead of being engaged in a useful and productive industry which is adding millions of wealth to the country. These men went on in their days of prosperity, and under the fostering influences of the Government, under the ameliorative legislation Congress has heretofore granted, built up a foreign and domestic trade—a foreign trade that carried millions of gallons abroad. In consequence of the ungenerous, harsh, and cruel policy now advocated by the gentleman from Georgia, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, a policy which, supported by fanatical influences, induced the last Congress to refuse any aid to this industry, that foreign trade has been stricken down, and the millions of gallons of spirits which were yearly exported have been thrown upon the home market, making demoralization where under prospective good treatment there would have been prosperity. Instead of exporting 16,000,000 gallons of their product these men are now compelled to lock it up in the warehouses; and bankruptcy and ruin are upon them because their foreign market has been taken away from them.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like, for the sake of information, to ask the gentleman whether there has ever been any considerable foreign trade in the class of whiskies now in bond and which will be aided by the legislation now asked?

Mr. THOMPSON. There has been some foreign trade——

Mr. HISCOCK. Any considerable foreign trade?

Mr. THOMPSON. There has been sufficient foreign trade, not only in these but other whiskies with which they are allied, to relieve the home market of 16,000,000 gallons per year. But now not one gallon can be exported by these men because of the cruel policy of their own Government, which has compelled them to forego the advantages they might have enjoyed by building up a foreign trade.

In this respect the policy of our Government is similar to that which the English Government has pursued toward the Irish people. When Ireland complains of the harsh laws enacted against her people, and says, "We are unable at present to support our population; we want the lands thrown open, so that we can labor and can support ourselves in productive industry," England refuses any aid, and tells the Irish people that the ports are open, that they may, if they choose, emigrate to other countries to seek that which is denied them at home. So when you have adopted harsh and oppressive legislation toward this interest, you say, "the ports are open; you may, if you choose, go to foreign governments and seek there what you are denied in free America."

No other government on earth adopts such legislation with reference to distilled spirits. No other government imposes excise taxes as we do upon the producer of spirits. The English Government long years ago outgrew this policy. Are we to go back and follow the system which other governments have cast aside? England has collected taxes upon spirits for over two hundred years, and for a long time fixed by law a period within which the tax must be paid upon spirits in bond; but she found that it only brought about the same condition of things that we have found here, it tended to bring bankruptcy and ruin upon the producers.

A harsh system of legislation brought about illicit distilling and violations of the law. Hence, in 1848, England so arranged her taxation as to lay it only on the consumer, the spirits remaining in bond until withdrawn for consumption, since which time she has been able to collect a tax of $2.50 upon every gallon of spirits consumed in that country, amounting to $260,000,000 every year, which goes into the coffers of the British Government, collected from among only 33,000,000 of population; while under our harsh system of legislation (which I think some gentlemen influenced by the fanatical sentiment of the prohibitionist would make harsher) our Government can only wring from this product between $60,000,000 and $80,000,000 a year, and in doing that bankrupt those who deal in it and produce it. I trust we will not listen to fanaticism or prejudice. Let us bring to this question the intelligent consideration of the House.

In 1864, when under your laws there was an unlimited bonded period and only 20,000,000 population to consume, the Southern States being in rebellion, there was manufactured and put into the bonded warehouses of the country 84,000,000 gallons of whisky. That whisky could remain there, as tobacco and beer do now, an unlimited length of time, until the necessities of trade called it forth for the legitimate purposes of consumption. Did bankruptcy follow that enormous manufacture of 84,000,000 gallons? Not at all. That whisky remained in bond from year to year until the demands of consumption called it forth, and no financial crisis ever arose. But in 1868, when the policy was adopted of requiring the tax to be paid within the year, whisky could not seek its legitimate avenues of trade, and then for the first time trouble commenced.

Having lived in a district where this productive industry is much followed, I tell you now that under that law distillers were made bankrupts every third year. In 1878, when this bankruptcy threatened to become universal, Congress interfered, and allowed three years upon all whisky then in bond and thereafter to be made. Why was the one-year law enacted in 1868? The gentleman from Georgia, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, tells us it was the frauds perpetrated upon the revenue under the former system that brought about the change in our legislation, and leaves you to believe the frauds resulted from the fact that no time was fixed in the law theretofore for the payment of the tax. I will tell you what was the cause. The frauds of which he speaks were not brought about by the failure of the law prior to 1868 to fix a period in which the whisky must be removed and tax paid. The tax was laid, and intelligently laid, upon the consumer; no distiller paid a tax until his product went into market. The law was the same then upon the distiller as upon the brewer and manufacturer of tobacco now. The change resulted from other causes than time.

These frauds were brought about by undertaking in those troublous times, the war just being over and the whole country demoralized, to extract from this article a tax of $2 a gallon, which was over ten times the cost price of its production.

Mr. CARLISLE. The frauds preceded it ten years.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am speaking of the act of 1868. What further? How were those frauds perpetrated and out of what did they grow? It was not the result of the unlimited time, by no means. They grew out of the enormous tax of $2 per gallon and the fact that the bonded-warehouse system at that time enabled men to transport whisky from one part of the country to another, from district to district, from State to State, until lost sight of by the officers, and the tax was escaped. The inducements to defraud at $2 per gallon were irresistible. They removed whisky from one bonded warehouse to another in an unlimited and unrestricted manner under the control and almost at the option of the men who owned it. They could travel it over the country until it was lost in traveling.

The $2 a gallon induced the Government officers to join in with the dealers and manufacturers and take it from these warehouses, brand it tax paid, and put it on the market in defiance of the law. It was not the distillers in Kentucky. No prosecution was ever made in the State I represent growing out of the whisky frauds of 1866 and 1867 and 1868. None ever occurred there and no stain was ever put upon the reputation of these men in Kentucky. They have never been charged with illicit distillation. They have never attempted to defraud the Government of one dollar of its revenue. On the contrary, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue tells us how in the last ten years since the extension of the bonded period that of all the millions which have been collected from this article and gone into the Treasury of the United States not one dollar has been lost by fraud or in any other way. That is a fair record, and it is with that honest record that these men present themselves before this House to-day in asking for this act of simple justice at the hands of the Government.

But the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] tells you—and I was surprised to hear him say it; I wish he was in his seat now—he tells you, and I ask attention to the argument he makes in this case, he tells you, Mr. Chairman, that we have the bond of these men for the payment of this tax. He says to them, "You are intelligent men; you went into the manufacture of this article of whisky with the full knowledge that at the end of three years you must pay this tax: you have given us a bond for this payment, and we demand it in the name of that bond." Ah, Mr. Chairman, it is the same language that Shylock used when he demanded his pound of flesh—it was so nominated in the bond. Said Shylock, I demand my pound of flesh because you have so named it in your bond. So the gentleman from Georgia, a distinguished statesman, demands the payment of his bond although it bankrupts and turns out houseless and homeless the wives and children of every person who is engaged in the manufacture of these goods.

Is this great and generous Government, magnanimous as it is, to fall under the domination and control of men who exact and demand their pound of flesh although it is extracted at the expense of the tears of homeless weeping children; at the expense of bankruptcy and ruin to a large and industrious class of honest and faithful producers? Is that the boasted magnanimity and generosity of the men I have associated with so long? Are these our Southern friends by whom we have stood during the perilous and troublous time through which we have passed? I have been taught, and it has been a lesson I believed to be true, that in the South, this land of flowers, this land of beauty, with genial climate and fertile soil, radiant with eternal sunshine, where fruits and flowers spring perennial, generosity and magnanimity were the universal qualities in the hearts of every one of its people. Its hospitality, charity to the needy, and chivalric defense of the oppressed were lessons instilled into my infantile mind on the knees of my mother, who ever boasted of her native South.

But, sir, how has that splendid fabric of my childish belief been skaken to-day when I find two Southern gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee out-Heroding Herod in favor of that cold and cruel policy which would demand in the name of the bond bankruptcy and ruin of these poor oppressed men, guilty of no crime. I have also been taught, Mr. Chairman, that upon the other side, coming from the North, instead of a kind and generous policy, to look for a cold enforcement of the principle that the last cent should be paid: that they were cold, money-making men, who devoted their lives to the accumulation of wealth. But what do I find? I find that the cold business men of the North look with more concern on the bankruptcy of our people, regard their condition with more magnanimity and generosity than do those whom I have so long loved and by whom I have stood in so many troublous times. These Southern men have turned the back of their hands upon us, and we find at the hands of the business men of the North that just and fair treatment which a great question like this deserves.

I come to the consideration of this proposition in a plain business way. I think I can demonstrate not only if this extension is given that the Government will not lose one cent of this revenue, but I think I can demonstrate furthermore that it will result in no reduction of the revenue during the time it is continued. There will be, in my judgment, no reduction of the revenue and no endangerment of its collection.

I can not understand why, with threatened bankruptcy on the one hand of a large number of its citizens, this extension can not be granted by the Government from a business point of view. Surely the welfare of any of its citizens is of interest to the Government. A moment ago I gave the history of this tax. I undertook to show that these men are making no unjust demand. But the gentleman from Georgia says it is an outrage for them to come here again and ask for an extension of time. It is not their fault, but it is the fault of the law. The defect is in the law and not in the men. The disease with which they are stricken is in the law itself; it is a fatal defect in the system that brings periodical bankruptcy upon them. There never can and never will be quiet until the cause for agitation is removed. When the tax is again laid upon this article when called into consumption, as it is upon every other article of domestic manufacture, then agitation will cease, and Congress will not be periodically called upon for extensions of time. This is the only article which pays the tax before that period. The tax has been removed from all other manufactures except beer, tobacco, and spirits; and the producers of spirits only seek to be put equal before the law with the others.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, the shorter this period is the more frequently recurring will be these disasters, while the longer the period the less trouble they will be.

And now let me address myself for a moment to another question. Why is there no danger of loss to the Government by this extension?

The answer is easy and simple. The Government has bonds with good sureties for the payment of the tax in full, which bonds are taken each month for the product of the month preceding. It has a lien upon the distillery premises, warehouses, and machinery, in addition to the bonds. Besides this, they give a bond every year for an enormous amount to protect against all frauds. The Government is not yet satisfied. It takes charge of the distillery and the warehouses, weighs out each bushel of grain, watches its progress of manufacture, attaches its tax as soon as mashed, receives the whisky when made, marks and brands it, puts it in the warehouse, locks it up, keeps the key from the owner, and finally delivers it out after the tax is paid and not before. After it is warehoused it can not escape the tax.

But, say gentlemen, if this whisky is continued in bond the Government will lie out of its revenues in consequence of the extension. Not at all. The revenue of the Government must at last come from consumption, consumption by evaporation, or other loss or legitimate use. This will amount to something near 80,000,000 of gallons per year. If you make the producer or manufacturer advance the tax for any considerable time and amount ahead of consumption you may bankrupt him, but you will not increase the revenue. Production will cease until consumption catches up, and there will be a decrease in the tax until this takes place and the basis of legitimate business is restored.

Every one knows this, and consequently to force this whisky out of bond ahead of consumptive demand and compel these men to sell it upon a broken-down market will bankrupt them, put the tax in the Treasury a few months earlier than it would go under the extension, but the next year would show a corresponding decrease, for none would be taken out until all forced thus upon the market had been consumed. What will result if the bill be passed? Of the 80,000,000 per annum consumed about 65,000,000 are of the low grade and about 15,000,000 fine whisky. Last year it reached nearly 20,000,000; so we can safely say of the 43,000,000 of bourbon whisky on which the tax will mature in the next two years 35,000,000 will be consumed during that time, and the extension will only apply to 8,000,000 of gallons of whisky of this age, and this 8,000,000 will be consumed in six months after the extension; so we will realize in interest about 2½ per cent. on $7,200,000, the tax on 8,000,000 of gallons. Nor will the Government experience any even temporary reduction of her yearly revenue. The 80,000,000 will be consumed per annum. The 8,000,000 of these two years of our production, which if forced on the market would have been consumed and been a part of the 80,000,000 of annual consumption, still remaining in bond as permitted by this act, its place will be taken by 8,000,000 of the lower-grade whiskies, on which the Government will get its 90 cents per gallon tax. We will illustrate it thus: Annual consumption, 80,000,000; revenue, seventy-two millions. Of this 65,000,000 low grade, revenue on which is fifty-eight and one-half millions; 15,000,000 bourbon, revenue on which is thirteen and one-half millions; total, seventy-two millions. This is what would occur if left to come out under the extension; but if no bill is passed, what then? It will stand thus: Annual consumption, 80,000,000; revenue, seventy-two millions. Of this 50,000,000 low grade, revenue on which is forty-five millions; 30,000,000 bourbon, revenue on which is twenty-seven millions; total, seventy-two millions. So we see the only question is the forced displacement of the lower grade of whisky by forcing the fine bourbon into its place, by driving the distillers and dealers into bankruptcy, selling their goods at 30 cents a gallon which have cost them 70, for no reason on earth unless it is to show the power of the Government.

We are asked, Mr. Chairman, whether, if this extension is given, these parties will not go on piling up in bond whisky on top of whisky until hundreds of millions are in the warehouse. Manifestly not. They do not make whisky to keep in the warehouse; they make it to sell. They will not make a gallon or keep it in the warehouse one day longer than the market requires it. They are governed by the same business interests and principles as other men. They will, if they are not mistaken, manufacture only what they can sell, and sell at a profit.

Do you know how much whisky was manufactured year before last? In 1881 31,000,000 gallons were manufactured; in 1882, 25,000,000 in Kentucky; and last year there were less than 10,000,000 gallons of this product made. What was the reason for this decline? Why was there this reduction? Because the manufacturers saw that there had been overproduction, and by shutting down their distilleries they have undertaken to relieve themselves as far as they could in a business way. Many of our largest distilleries, costing thousands of dollars, have not had a fire in them for nearly two years.

They shut off last year over 15,000,000 gallons out of the 25,000,000 that had been manufactured the previous year in Kentucky and 20,000,000 of this class all over the country.

Does not that look like an effort on their part to save themselves from a financial crisis and bankruptcy? They would be safe now were it not that the Government comes and demands of them in three months nearly $20,000,000 in taxes. They have been compelled to borrow and put into the product every dollar that they could borrow from the banks. Nearly every producer of this commodity has been compelled to go to the banks, and each one owes at least 30 cents a gallon for money borrowed on every gallon which is in their warehouses, and which is the full cost of manufacture. Having borrowed from their creditors the cost of production (and it being only worth now from 25 to 30 cents in the market, forced out by the Government in order to collect the tax upon it), do not you see that after having carried it for three years, paying the insurance and interest upon the loans, having to stand the shrinkage, it stands them at a cost price of 70 cents a gallon? Now force this whisky upon the market and it will sell for about 30 cents a gallon, the amount they owe on it, and the result of it is that every man who is engaged in the business is utterly ruined and his business destroyed.

Why force it now on the market for consumption in advance of the legitimate demands of trade? It is not because the Government wants the revenue to be derived from it, because we know that it will derive the same amount whether this particular whisky should enter into consumption and be forced upon the market or not. Because if you do not consume this whisky, if you do not force it into consumption at a reduced price, lower grades of whisky will enter into consumption, which can be made at a lower price and placed upon the market in lieu of this, and upon which lower grades the Government will get the same amount of tax at a fair profit. Besides that, we are told that the Government has a large surplus of revenue. Why, then, bankrupt these men by forcing this whisky upon the market before there is demand for it. There is no reason, Mr. Chairman, given for it; no intelligent reason so far as I have heard up to this time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few more suggestions in the time I have. I see now the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] in his seat. I thought day before yesterday, during his speech, he would go into spasms when he found, as he alleged, the great tobacco-raisers, the farmers in the country, were groaning under a tobacco tax. The law gives to the manufacturer of tobacco an unlimited length of time in which to carry their product into market. But the gentleman from Georgia says the Commissioner of Internal Revenue reports to him that in less than three months after the tobacco crop is raised it goes into the manufacturers' hands and the tax is collected.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know my friend from Kentucky does not intend to misstate me.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, sir; I certainly do not. If I am in error I want my friend to correct me.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not make that statement.

Mr. THOMPSON. But you made one so close akin to it that it would be difficult to tell the difference.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to explain, although I do not wish to occupy his time? The argument had been made that the whisky manufacturers had an advantage over the manufacturers of tobacco. It was in that connection I made the statement, not in relation to the farmers but in relation to the manufacturers of tobacco, as to the time the article went into market and when the tax was paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am sorry that I have occupied my friend's time, and ask that it be extended five or ten minutes.

Mr. WOLFORD. I hope my colleague's time will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman from Kentucky being extended for ten minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am certainly thankful to the House for the indulgence they have shown me on this occasion. As I said in the outset, I feel a very deep interest in this question because of my constituents, a great many of whom at least are interested in this matter, and if this relief is withheld it means bankruptcy to them. Therefore I have felt it may be an undue interest in it, and I speak from the standpoint of an interested man. I am trying to state as fairly as I can to the committee what I consider the business propositions involved, and I had just come to the point where my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], as I said a moment ago, almost went into spasms over the laboring man in the tobacco field, "who," he said, "pays an enormous tax on his tobacco."

Who loans the poor toiling man in the tobacco field in his time of distress money at 4½ per cent.?

Who loans it to him? Not my friend from Georgia, I am certain, because he is not ready to lend money to anybody at all it seems.

Mr. BLOUNT. Because I have not got it.

Mr. THOMPSON. The gentleman in his remarks the other day continued—

And why should he be compelled to pay taxes to the Government in order that the money may be used in this way?

Now, I do think my friend from Georgia, being on the Ways and Means Committee of this House, ought to know there is no tax paid by the farmer who toils in the field and raises tobacco.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not say so.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am reading from the gentleman's remarks in the RECORD.

Who loans the poor toiling man in the tobacco field at 4½ per cent.? And why should he—

Who is "he?" Why, that poor toiling man that seemed to trouble my friend from Georgia so much—

And why should he be compelled to pay taxes to the Government in order that the money may be used in this way? Why should there be taken from his hard earnings—

Whose hard earnings? Those of the poor toiling man—

Why should there be taken from his hard earnings money to be used for any such purpose as this?

Now, then, if my friend from Georgia upon the Ways and Means Committee has not stated to this House in that speech that money has been wrung from the poor toiling man in the tobacco fields to loan to these bloated bondholding whisky men, I can not read the English language and fail to comprehend what the gentleman means.

Is that a fair statement of this case coming from the gentleman who, on the Ways and Means Committee, is to guide you to a fair and deliberate consideration of the business interest? Does not my friend know that no poor toiler in the tobacco field pays one cent of tax upon the tobacco he raises? If he did I would remove it instantly if I could. Does he not know that the poor man who toils in the field pays no more of a tax on his tobacco than the man who raises the corn manufactured into whisky pays the tax on the whisky?

The farmer raises his tobacco, and the manufacturer pays the tax when it goes into consumption. And that is all that these men ask. "Oh," but my friend from Georgia says, "you are extracting money from the pockets of the laboring men to lend to these people." Not one dollar. They do not ask you to lend them anything. They are not borrowing money from the Government. The Government has got no money to lend to them, and they have nothing to ask from the Government in that way. This money has not been collected yet. The Government is merely asked to take its hand off their throats in order that they may get breath enough to pay the Government the tax it demands of them. Nothing is taken from the coffers of the Government. It has not gone in yet. Until it has got there the Government can not lend it.

Mr. WILLIS. If burned up to-morrow it never would go in, and the Government would lose nothing.

Mr. THOMPSON. As my friend suggests, if the whisky were burned up to-morrow the Government would get nothing; and not only that, but if the owners were to export it to-morrow the Government would not get a dollar of its tax.

Not only that, but if the policy which gentlemen advocate here should be pursued and these men shall be forced to pay the tax on this article, then the next day after the tax was paid they could export this whisky and have the tax returned to them under the rebate system of the Government.

Gentlemen have argued here, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has told us the same thing, that by the extension here asked you would merely pile up in these bonded warehouses more and more of this whisky, and would thereby induce an effort on the part of these men in the future to have the entire tax taken off. I say to those gentlemen that they are mistaken. I understood the gentleman from Maine by his question to my colleague [Mr. CLAY] to intimate that in extending the time for the payment of this tax the result would be that at the end of two years there would be a hundred millions of gallons of whisky in the bonded warehouses.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman will permit me, what I said was this: if the forced payment of the tax on 70,000,000 gallons of whisky would produce a panic, what will the forced payment of the tax on a hundred millions of gallons do?

Mr. THOMPSON. My friend is mistaken as to what will occur. If the time is extended none will be forced out; it will come out as consumption calls it. Let me tell you what has been the history of this matter. Under the one-year period there was left in the bonded warehouses an average of 16,000,000 gallons per year. When the time was extended to three years you would naturally expect that the amount would somewhat exceed that left in under the one-year period, because the distillers would then be carrying in stock not merely what would be consumed from day to day but what would be consumed during three years. It would naturally be something over three times that amount. Therefore you would expect to find in these warehouses from fifty to sixty millions of gallons of whisky, about 15,000,000 less than the amount that you do find.

It is this surplus of 15,000,000 which is being forced upon the market which is making all the trouble. If you extend the bonded period still further then these parties would carry a little more, because they can carry it in the warehouses as long as the Government tax is not forced upon them. The whole 50,000,000 would not be carried over for two years, and have thirty or fifty more added to it, as the gentleman from Maine suggests. It would be taken out from day to day during that time and full 35,000,000 of it consumed in the next two years; only the surplus of 15,000,000 would be carried over, and only 8,000,000 of that is this old whisky made in 1881 and 1882. The warehouses show a decrease of nearly 10,000,000 last year, and will show a much larger this. There is no danger of piling up again. It was not induced before by extension of time, but by the sudden freeing of capital and great prosperity and activity in all manufactures growing out of the resumption of specie payments.

Is it a crime in these men to manufacture whisky and to store it in these warehouses? And is it wrong in the Government to allow them to do so? Why should the Government demand the tax before the whisky is taken out for consumption? That is all there is in the matter.

You will get the same amount of revenue whether this tax is collected now or later. If you do not want this tax repealed, if you do not want a strong and powerful party for the repeal of this tax to be organized in this country, when you come in a year or two to consider this question of repealing the internal-revenue system, you will let this whisky remain in bond; for as long as it is in bond you will have a guarantee that the tax upon it will not be repealed.

But if you force this whisky now in bond out into consumption, then they will demand the repeal of the tax. They will point to the ruin it has wrought, to the grievance which they have borne, and want the tax repealed. There being little or no whisky in bond, there will be little opposition to a repeal of the tax.

But I was on the subject to which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] called my attention, that was the subject of the laws relating to the bonded warehouse system as connected with import duties. My friend from Georgia said that the tobacco men paid all their taxes within six months of the time the article was produced. I come from a tobacco-raising country, and I tell you that tobacco is not ready for the market within six months of the time that it is produced. From the tobacco field it goes into the tobacco barn, where it is cured. Then during the long weary and dreary winter months it is stripped and handled and prepared for market. The next spring, when the roads will permit, it goes into the manufacturer's hands, and quite a year expires before it is even manufactured. When manufactured, it goes into the manufacturer's warehouses unstamped and untaxed, and remains there until it is sold to the wholesale dealers and jobbers. When it is taken from the warehouse the tax is paid upon it by means of the stamp which is required by the Government.

The farmer has nothing to do with paying the tax; nothing is taken from any laboring man. If one straw was laid in additional weight upon the back of either, I would not support the bill. No one sympathizes deeper than I do with the unfortunate condition of the farmers and laboring classes in this country. I believe this bill to be in their interest. It opens up again a great market for their surplus grain and gives employment at remunerative wages to thousands of men.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I will take the floor and yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS].

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Chairman, this bill does not propose a permanent change of existing laws in regard to the time or manner of collecting the tax on distilled spirits; but it proposes a special change, or rather a temporary suspension, of a general law affecting an important source of the revenues of the Government. Should it become a law it would postpone for two years the time of paying taxes now due or hereafter to become due since the 1st day of December, 1883, on spirits in the bonded warehouses. We are boldly asked, when sent here to legislate under the limitations of the Constitution for the general welfare of the whole people, to turn from this great purpose and to grant special relief to a special but powerful interest, to relieve it from just burdens under the law. Sir, I regard the bill under consideration as the worst form of class legislation, because it is in the interest of a great and strong monopoly and is retroactive in its operations, and because the relief sought, if granted, will be at the expense of the great body of the taxpayers of the country. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] who has just spoken in favor of the bill, like others preceding him in this debate, announced in the beginning of his remarks that he would discuss the measure as a business question solely. But before he finished his speech we heard his sympathetic appeal on account of the widows and orphans that would be distressed in the event of the failure of this bill to pass.

We saw him turn, as he said, to those whom he had been taught to regard as cold and unsympathetic, coming from another section of the country, the North, while those whom he had been accustomed to trust, and with whom he had stood in the struggles of the past, turned the back of their hands upon this measure and arrayed themselves in opposition to it. He appealed to the former to come to the support of this bill.

I submit in all candor to the gentleman from Kentucky whether this is dealing with a business question solely in a business way. I do not propose to deal with it except as a business question and as a matter of public policy.

I shall not discuss the temperance question. I do not believe that this bill affects that question one way or the other. Gentlemen tell us, and the statistics bear them out, that in the bonded warehouses there is now enough whisky to supply the demands of the country for two years to come, and that it can not be sold to profit in foreign countries. Then, if the whole country is supplied, and the foreign market is overrun, so that there is no demand even in foreign countries, how can this question affect the cause of temperance? It seems that the whole country has all the whisky it wants, and that there is a two years' supply laid up.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] seems to be disturbed about two matters. He is annoyed continually on account of the surplus of money in the Treasury. He is not annoyed on account of the surplus of whisky in the bonded warehouses, but he does complain of the quality of the whisky. How he gets his information as to that I am not able to say, but he advocates this measure upon the ground that the Government does not need the tax now due and shortly to become due on this whisky.

But let us come to a business view of the merits of the bill under consideration. The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows the amount of whisky in bond affected by this bill to be 73,000,000 gallons. The tax is 90 cents per gallon, and under the general law must be paid within or at the end of three years from the time it is placed in bond. Therefore the aggregate of the tax falling due under that imitation since the 1st of December last, and shortly to become due, is about $66,000,000. The payment of this we are asked to defer for two years upon the ground that there has been an overproduction of this article; that it is the only article taxed upon which the tax must be paid before it can be sold for consumption, and that it will withdraw from the business of the country $66,000,000 and lock it up in the Treasury where there is already a surplus.

Originally the tax upon this product was collectible only upon sale of the same for consumption, but under that system there sprang up the great and scandalous whisky frauds that attracted the attention of the whole country a few years ago. Then the time for the payment of taxes was limited by statute to one year. After that, in 1878, in the interest of large whisky manufacturers, that time was extended to three years. This increase of the time, as shown by the statistics, caused a greater overproduction than had ever occurred under prior laws, having reached more than 80,000,000 gallons last year. But upon the refusal of the last Congress to pass a bill similar to this the amount has been somewhat diminished.

But suppose that after having had three years this interest is allowed two more within which to pay the tax; have we any reason to doubt, in view of the past, that the oversupply at the end of that two years would be greater than it is now? It would then probably amount to 100,000,000 gallons or more. Gentlemen argue that if the $66,000,000 now due and soon to become due on that now in bond is required to be paid according to laws in existence before and at the time it was made it will bring about distress and even a financial crisis. If this is a true prophecy, then at the end of the two years' extension asked for, if granted, the crisis will be still greater or the collection of these taxes must be abandoned altogether, for it is evident that the longer the time is extended the greater is the overproduction above the demand for consumption.

It is argued that this product is discriminated against in this: that the tax is required to be paid within three years whether sold or withdrawn for consumption or not, whereas no tax is imposed on any other product and required to be paid except upon consumption. But a careful investigation of the revenue laws and the reasons upon which they stand will show this complaint to be unjust. It is said that there is no limit of time within which the tax on manufactured tobacco must be paid; that it is only paid when it is sold for consumption, without regard to any limited time. This is true; but every law has its reason.

Tobacco in the course of trade, regulated by supply and demand, is sold for consumption within a short time after manufacture. It does not improve by keeping, but soon begins to deteriorate in value. Therefore there is no reason for requiring the tax to be paid within a given time prior to sale for consumption, because it must be sold for that purpose within a short time. Not so with whisky, because under the internal-revenue system and the monopoly fostered by it large accumulations of capital are invested in its production, overstocking the markets of the world with about the only manufactured product that improves and rapidly appreciates in value by keeping. Under this system it is guarded and protected in the warehouses at the expense of the Government by officials paid by the tax-payers of the country, without expense to the manufacturer or owner.

If while in this custody it is destroyed by fire or otherwise, no tax is required. There is therefore no necessity of a specified time for the payment of tax on tobacco, but strong practical reasons why there should be as to the tax on the manufacture of whisky. Gentlemen have referred to the liberality of the laws with reference to importers of foreign goods to further show discrimination against the whisky interest, but a careful study and understanding of these laws will disprove the charge they make; for the latter may stay in the bonded warehouse free of tax and guarded by the Government, and then be withdrawn upon payment of the tax if to be sold or used in this country, or without tax altogether if it be exported to other countries.

Imported goods can remain in our custom-houses without payment of the duty only one year, or if longer than one year by payment of 10 per cent. upon their value for the second and third year. At the end of three years they are considered as abandoned to the Government unless the tax is paid. I fail to see any discrimination against manufacturers of distilled spirits by a comparison of these laws. Strip this question of all confusion thrown about it by the specious arguments adduced by the advocates of the measure, and it is nothing less than a proposition for the Government to loan money to those liable for this tax. I will not say that this is true to the full extent of the $66,000,000, which would be the tax on the whisky now in bond if it should all be sold or consumed in the United States, for it is fair to presume that it will not, and that some of it will be exported to other countries, and will not therefore under the Constitution, which forbids a tax on exports, be liable to any tax.

But it is also fair to presume that the greater part of it will be sold and consumed in the United States and will be liable under the law to the tax. This being true, the passage of the bill would be substantially a loan of the greater part of the sum of $66,000,000 to the owners of the product. But we are told that the Government has already a surplus in the Treasury and has no immediate need of this. Again, we are told that the bill requires the payment of 4½ per cent. interest per annum during the period of the extension or loan. Why should the Government collect promptly all that is due from the great body of tax-payers, the weak and the poor, many of whom pay 7 or 8 per cent. upon mortgage debts that rest upon their little homes, upon the very shelter that protects their families from the storm, and the soil that yields them support, in order to hoard money to loan by the million to a great monopoly?

We are told that the Government will be perfectly safe, and will get the tax with 4½ per cent. interest; that it is purely a business transaction, and a good one for the Government. If this were all true beyond dispute this great interest would be independent of such favors as are asked by this bill. If the owners of this whisky can make the Government so safe as to make this such an advantageous transaction to the Government, why can they not also secure individuals, banks, and business institutions equally as well? No, Mr. Chairman, there is in my judgment something beyond all this. It seems now quite probable that the internal-revenue system will not be continued in force many years longer. If the policy of postponing the collection of taxes to the encouragement of continued overproduction is begun, it is highly probable that when the time comes to abolish this system of taxation Congress will be asked to remit altogether the unpaid tax at that time, upon the ground that those paying 90 cents tax on the gallon can not compete in the market with those dealing in that made and sold free of tax.

The gentleman from Kentucky, replying to the question as to who will lend money at 4½ per cent. to the poor tobacco producers of the South, scouts the idea that the farmer who raises tobacco pays any tax to the Government. He says it is paid by the manufacturer.

It is true that the money is passed into the hands of the Government through the medium of the manufacturer, but in fact the tax is ultimately paid by the consumer in both cases. But when the gentleman from Kentucky says that the farmer who raises tobacco is not taxed he is mistaken. It is true that he may sell his tobacco to an authorized manufacturer who has complied with the laws of the United States in the manufacture of tobacco. But if the man who raises a small amount of tobacco on his farm undertakes to sell it to anybody else he violates a penal law of the United States. Although he may not have five hundred dollars' worth of property for the support of his family, for the maintenance and education of his children, yet if he sells a pound of tobacco to anybody except an authorized manufacturer under the law, you do not merely deal with his finances and threaten him with bankruptcy as to the small amount he owns, but you seize his person and incarcerate him in prison as a criminal for selling tobacco which he has made by the sweat of his face with his own hands upon his own land.

By act of the last Congress the producer is allowed the generous privilege of selling as much as a hundred dollars' worth of tobacco a year, provided he sells it on the premises on which he makes it and to the consumer only. Gracious privilege that the toiling farmer has in this free country! This was accorded to him only a few months ago. Prior to that time he could not sell a pound, except to an authorized manufacturer, without violating a penal statute and being indicted in a Federal court, perhaps one hundred miles from his home, where he could not defend himself without great expense.

But before discussing this system further now, as I wish to recur to it again, let us notice another argument that has been offered in support of the proposition before the House. The distinguished gentleman, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in his report says that during the period that this oversupply of whisky was made it was not peculiar to that business, but that there was an overproduction in almost all other departments of productive industry throughout the country. What other business which has been overdone during that period is coming here and asking relief at the hands of the Government on account of overproduction or because of disasters in business? It is natural to sympathize with those who are in distress and who are unfortunate in business.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. Can you name any other business interest in these United States, except the tobacco and whisky business, upon which there is an internal-revenue tax? I ask the gentleman to name a single one upon which this kind of a tax is imposed.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Tobacco and whisky are the chief products from which the internal-revenue tax is derived.

Mr. WILLIS. There are no others.

Mr. CLEMENTS. These are, I admit, the chief items.

Mr. WILLIS. Therefore they are not placed on a par with other industries, and they should not be compared with them by the gentleman in his argument.

Mr. CLEMENTS. It would be just as legitimate for the other industries to come and ask relief from the consequences of overproduction in another way as for this interest to ask relief from taxation. Now suppose, for instance, that there was overproduction of any given class or kind of goods until the supply had gone beyond the demand of the market and the manufacturers were consequently in financial distress. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] suggests that we would have a howl for larger protection. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky and those who advocate this bill if they would respond to their appeal and advocate larger protection, if they would give relief on account of overproduction in that case? Is the paternal hand of the Government to be extended in relief to every private business? Is the Government to become an insurer against losses by speculation and overproduction

It is admitted that a large proportion of this whisky is now owned or controlled by others than the distillers; that the banks are largely interested in it. I invite attention to the copies of telegrams which have been recently sent from different parts of the country, mostly from those sections where the whisky is in bond, urging the passage of this bill.

Copies of these telegrams are upon our desks this morning. If I have made no mistake in hastily counting and classifying the persons and business firms from whom they come, I find one hundred and one in all, seventy-one of whom are bankers or bank officials; only three or four are distillers. Allow me to read just one of these telegrams. It is as follows:

I believe it will be a benefit to all Northwestern banks to pass the bond extension bill.

T. R. WALSH, President.

Are these the orphans alluded to by the gentleman from Kentucky? Banking is a legitimate business, entitled to justice under the laws, but I know of nothing entitling those engaged in it in the section of the whisky monopoly to special relief from the consequences of mistakes in business at the expense of the tax-paying public. Government should guarantee equal justice and protection to all, whether weak or strong, but not special favors to the few at the expense of the many.

Let these great interests as well as the poor individual tax-payer "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's."

Fifty-three million gallons of this whisky is in the Kentucky warehouses—over two-thirds of the entire amount. The strongest appeals for the passage of this bill come from Representatives from that State. Yet we look in vain to them for aid to repeal the internal-revenue system. They are unwilling to give up a system that has established and fosters this great monopoly, which is protective in its operations to this interest in the localities where it is established. On this account this interest seems to want the tax continued theoretically but not to be paid in fact.

I will join hands with those who desire to strike down this internal-revenue system in its entirety. I believe, sir, that the time has come when we can afford to do it. But it is said that we must tax whisky and tobacco because they are luxuries. The tax is borne by the consumer. The consumers of these articles are the poor as well as the rich. The tax on tobacco virtually excludes the small farmer from its production. If the vexations and penalties of this system were removed this would soon become an important and profitable product in many sections where under these vexatious laws it has been almost abandoned, and yet where the soil and climate are eminently suited by nature to its growth. The removal of the Federal tax from whisky will not make it free of tax. All of the States tax it and will continue to do so.

I boldly venture the assertion that the internal-revenue laws have not been promotive of temperance. Under them no less whisky has been made or consumed than would otherwise have been. There has been no less drunkenness under these laws than prior to their existence. Upon this point I appeal to the experience and observation of all. Under these laws the whole country now has an oversupply sufficient for two years. More is made and consumed than ever before in the history of the country; but under the monopolizing tendencies of these laws the profits of making it are concentrated in the hands of the few. This system means plenty of whisky for all, and large profits thereon to the protected few. Temperance, prohibition, local-option laws, &c., are not materially advanced by the indirect aid of tax on whisky. The success of such laws depends mainly, as is demonstrated all through Georgia and other States to-day, upon the support and strength of public sentiment. The abolition of this system would leave the States and local authorities to increase the tax for State and local purposes, thereby diminishing the direct tax for State and municipal purposes; and when public sentiment demands it, the State authorities could suppress the traffic as they now do in many instances.

The present large surplus of about $150,000,000 withdrawn from the business of the country and locked up in the vaults of the Treasury emphatically admonishes us that taxation must be reduced. This is necessary in order to avert financial embarrassment of the business of the country consequent upon the withdrawal of so great a sum from the aggregate circulation of the country, already none too large. Again, it is necessary, in the interest of honest, economical government, that we have no such constant and unnecessary surplus, inviting gross extravagance in the application of the same, for by whatever devious channel it reaches the vaults of the Government it is at last the result of burdens upon labor, the foundation of the wealth of nations as well as of individuals.

The excise or direct-tax system by the Federal Government has ever been repugnant to the people. It has only been resorted to three times in the history of the Government. First, in consequence of the Revolutionary war; second, in consequence of the war of 1812; and third, in consequence of the late war. Thus it will be seen that it has never been resorted to except as a war necessity. These laws have in each case been unwelcome to the people and resisted by them. They caused a great and expensive insurrection in Pennsylvania. They have caused strife and bloodshed whenever they have been in force. They are in their operations, with their spies and informers and petty prosecutions of the citizen, contrary to the genius and spirit of this Government of a proud and free people. It is said that these taxes are collected more cheaply to the Government than any other, but such a conclusion is the result of a false method of calculation. This would appear to be true if we only count the salaries and expenses of those engaged in the collection of these taxes. But when we add to these, the expenses attending the prosecution of the many thousand cases arising in the courts, and the expenses borne by the defendants in such cases, and the value of property seized and destroyed under these laws, the system is found to be an expensive one to the people.

The following figures show the heavy expense attending the collection of these taxes in the State of Georgia. Official statements show that in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, there was collected in the second Georgia internal-revenue district the sum of $307,770.27. The expenses for the same time in this district were $71,460.94. The collections in the third Georgia district for the same time aggregated $87,890.76, and the expenses $22,256.02. I mention these figures simply to show a part of the operations of a system which is not a cheap one, but expensive to the people. I would be glad to continue the statements as to other districts and States, but have not the time to do so.

Mr. Jefferson denounced the similar system of his time as an "infernal system." The late Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, during his last term of service in this Hall, inveighed against these laws and advocated their entire abolition, denouncing them as "anti-republican, anti-democratic, and anti-American."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks I shall offer upon this question I shall confine myself to discussing the principle of taxation that enters into the bill. When this bill first sought consideration in the House I voted against its introduction, because it seemed to be justly antagonized with public matters in the shape of an appropriation bill. My disposition and expectation was to vote against it upon its passage. Yet I was perfectly willing to give it its day in court whenever it applied for it without causing any serious disturbance to what I considered more commanding claims. That expectation upon my part was predicated upon what may be called the first blush appearance of the matter and upon my antipathies to the whole whisky question and traffic, which I can not dignify by a higher term when entertained here by one acting in his official capacity as a national legislator than prejudice, as we ought to know no businesses in this Congress except in the general catalogue of equal industries.

Sir, I do not know of a cause that upon first appearance has more against it than this. A careful analysis of the question, however, has led me to the conclusion that this is a just bill and one that ought to pass the House.

At first blush it looks as if it were a piece of Simon Pure class legislation. It looks simply as if a lot of men thoroughly cognizant of the law had gone into the business of whisky making of their own volition, and instead of the markets giving them the profits which they hoped for, it has been unfavorable from one cause or another, and now they fear heavy and ruinous losses, and want the Government to come in and help them control prices. It looks as if it were simply an appeal to the Government to hold up in the collection of the tax, and thus virtually to lend them money at a low rate until their troubles are over. This would be class legislation of the worst sort.

And it would appear also as if this matter comes before Congress at a time singularly inopportune; as if it were an appeal to the Democratic majority now to grant exceptional relief. Though this is not a party question, or should not be, yet the Democratic party is responsible for the legislation which gets through the House, and will so be held by the country. This looks as if it were a piece of class legislation coming to us when the majority of our party in the House and a still greater majority of the party throughout the country are engaged in a special contest for the steady repeal of all such legislation which has been foisted upon the country.

It comes to us at the time when the Supreme Court itself has thrown open the flood-gates to the wildest heresies upon the currency question; at a time when, under the sanction of the Supreme Court of the United States, the people can come here and demand that Congress emit bills of credit without limit except its own discretion. It would seem as if any other class of people could come before Congress with exactly the same claims upon it for consideration if they should happen to get into business troubles. This doctrine would certainly be intolerable to Democrats, and would be singularly out of place now.

But if we give this matter careful and dispassionate consideration, what is the true status? Is this business in its relations to Congress in the same attitude as all other businesses in the country? No, sir. Is it in the same attitude with reference to Congress as any other business in the country? No, sir. It has marked, conspicuous, and very great and potent points of difference in its relations with Congress from that which is sustained by any other business that we have.

But those points of difference are not points of natural difference. This is not as if a plea were made for an "infant" industry to be fostered by subsidies until it gains prematurely, by feeding upon the blood of its brethren, the strength of manhood. I do not believe in legislating to crush out or by a partial treatment to force away any natural differences that exist between industries; for, in the first place, Congress has no just power, much as it has been and is now exercised, to legislate upon these distinctions; and, in the second place, Congress ought not to have any such power, for those differences are better equalized by natural growth.

But the differences in this case are artificial and have been caused by acts of a legislative character. The differences have been made by the acts of the Congress of the United States, and therefore they can properly be taken cognizance of by Congress. They are differences which you have created, and as the thing created never rises higher than its maker, these differences are always thoroughly under your dominion.

What are these differences? In the first place, this commodity is taxed higher by far than any other commodity in our country; it is taxed not less than 400 per cent. upon the cost value of the product. Those who have taken occasion to look into the question know that to produce a gallon of whisky in this country costs upon the average from 20 to 23 cents. The rate of tax is 90 cents on the gallon. What other commodity do we tax to the extent of 400 per cent.?

Compare it with the one other article of a somewhat similar character which we tax, an article which if it has any unjust difference arising from our action can come here and ask us to take cognizance of it. I refer to the article of tobacco. The tax on tobacco is now 8 cents per pound, which is about 100 per cent. of the average price of the article. If I am in error in that I trust my distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] will correct me. I remember reading in a speech of his a year or two ago that the average value of tobacco in the leaf was about 8 cents per pound. Am I correct in that?

Mr. TUCKER. Hardly as much as that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Very well. The tax of course is laid upon tobacco after it has acquired an additional value by being manufactured, in which case the perentage is less; so it can not be over 100 per cent. of the value of the article at the time it is taxed. Therefore, take our treatment of these two articles, the one we tax 100 per cent. and the other we tax 400 per cent. I need not multiply by quoting wines and other articles from the tariff list.

I am perfectly willing to admit the claim that the consumer pays the tax; that the tax is a small burden on the manufacturer of whisky. I am willing for the sake of argument to admit more. I am willing to admit that the mere matter of tax upon whisky, although it amounts to fully 400 per cent., is no burden whatever upon the manufacturer, and furnishes no ground for complaint.

Then wherein does come this cause of complaint? It comes from the manner in which that tax is laid. We all know the difference between carrying a burden rightly fitted and one that is badly fitted. The nature of the burden is that upon some classes of whisky the tax is compelled to be paid before the commodity enters into consumption; such whiskies have to go through an aging process, which is a part of the manufacturing, before they can be made ready for market. The tax is paid upon this article the same as upon cheap whiskies which do not require fifteen minutes to age them. Whenever you place a 400 per cent. tax upon an article before it is ready for the market you place a burden upon it which is of a most exhaustively onerous character.

Suppose they want to export that whisky, of which they have to export a large part; and compare the burden in this case with such a tax upon cotton or corn or wheat. If you have a bale of cotton worth $50, and there exists a condition of things under which you can not put it upon the market properly until after the lapse of two or three years, and you must pay a tax of $200 upon that bale of cotton before the time to market it comes, what chance have you to compete with other parts of the world when you have been losing the interest not only on your $50 but on $200 besides? If you wanted to hold it you could not; and if you were compelled to hold it, although you get a drawback of your tax when you export years hence, yet you have lost the interest or had it to pay upon $250 instead of upon only $50, and it would ruin you. That would take $25,000 as a steady outlay to hold one hundred bales of cotton. The interest would kill you. That would cut you off from the foreign market. Is that right?

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that exported whisky does not pay the tax?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Of course not. I am glad the gentleman has made that suggestion. It pays it, but the tax is paid back without interest when years after the whisky is exported. There is a drawback then. But the exporter of whisky loses all the interest on the 400 per cent. tax that had been paid. That is my main point. I want it to be clear.

Mr. WILLIS. And loses all the leakage.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. That is true and also proper. It prevents stealing. And he stands evaporation, which is right. If you pay the tax and want to hold that whisky three years, as indeed you have to hold it before it is ready for sale, and then you want to export it and put it upon the foreign market or you sell it to a foreign buyer, you lose the interest on 400 per cent. of the principal invested in the commodity, as well as on the principal itself, which latter is right, and you simply get back the naked tax with the loss of three years' interest on it. Here the whisky maker has been compelled to lend an enormous sum to the Government for years for nothing. Is that right?

Mr. HERBERT. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the manufacturer can hold his whisky here three years before the payment of any tax. At the end of that time it is said to be ripe for use; he can then export it, and there is no export tax on it at all.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I am astonished that my friend from Alabama, who has had occasion to study this bill, should know so little about whisky as that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HERBERT. I do not claim to be a judge.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I trust, sir, that we both now will know the facts of the trade without being judges of the merits of the article. [Renewed laughter.] When whisky comes out of the still the cheaper article, by the use of berries and chemicals, is made immediately ready for commerce. The fusil oil, a destructive and poisonous element, is thus extracted. It is ready for any market, and enters, with alcohol, which also requires no time, immediately into the arts, as well as into more objectionable consumption. But if it be intended to make the finer quality of whisky, for which there is at times a large foreign demand, the objectionable ingredients must be extracted by the chemical process of age, and it takes all of six years to do this. If it remains ten years, it is of course more perfect still. I have never heard any one complain that whisky grew meaner as it grew older. This is one thing that always honors its age.

Therefore, when you pay the tax at the period demanded by law, and you send the article to the port for the foreign market, you lose the interest on 400 per cent. of the principal as well as the interest on the principal. This is all I ever claimed as being the real burden; for I have admitted that the mere tax itself is, in my humble judgment, no burden worthy of complaint here at this time, and this industry is making no such complaint. I have tried to show the consequences that accrue from the method of collecting the tax; and in due time I will try to show that while we can rightly encumber this business in its home market, so far as the burden of simply taxing it for revenue goes, yet we have no right to go beyond that and persecute it, for the States have not given us that power; and we certainly can not deprive any community of the right of free export, for the Constitution expressly denies us that power. Hence to do what we now do is to usurp a power upon the one hand, and to violate a plain injunction, with all the danger and meanness of a clandestine method, upon the other hand. The Constitution says: "No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State." And right here, when we have arrived at the full measure of the true status of this business, will all the rights and wrongs of the case appear.

Now, we know that this method of imposing taxes does not apply to any other commodity in this country. As has been frequently and clearly demonstrated, you do not pay tax upon tobacco until it goes immediately into consumption. If the manufacturer of tobacco wants to keep it any length of time he puts it into the warehouse, and it never costs him interest except upon the capital invested in the tobacco. He does not have to buy his supply of stamps more than seven days ahead, and only one day ahead if a revenue officer be convenient. He pays his tax just as he ships his invoices. Tobacco pays tax as it goes into consumption, and that is the principle upon which taxes should be paid. Any other method of laying this taxation is burdensome and unjust. Hence this whisky interest has the right to complain of the discrimination that is made against it, and to ask as a legal business, so far as we are concerned, to be relieved of this class legislation. If any State lets it live we have to recognize it as the equal of any other business in its claims upon foreign and trans-state commerce.

Mr. Chairman, one other consideration is worthy of mention. This postponement of the tax upon whisky bears the appearance of a loan; but as I have said, it is not a loan. It is unfortunate that it has the appearance of a loan; yet I do not know of any better way of accomplishing the object really sought. The charge of interest is simply a delusive though effectual method of covering any undue expenses that may be incurred by the Government in connection with caring for the whisky which may remain in bond for an unusual length of time. For instance, a man is allowed to keep his imports in the custom-house for twelve months; but if he keeps them there for three years he is compelled to reimburse the Government for the extra care, the extra watching, &c.; and he is charged 10 per cent. upon the taxes, the storage, and other expenses that have accrued for the whole three years. This is the method by which the Government reimburses itself for charges which are difficult to compute and which are made up of different items. It amounts to say something more than 3 per cent. per annum for the whole three years, for some of the goods are taken out at a shorter time and pay the whole 10 per cent. Of course the amount of money that has to bear this interest is less than the principal invested in the commodity, say about three-fourths of the principal. If interest at this low rate on a part of the principal be sufficient for imports, then surely interest at a higher rate, 4½, as proposed in this bill, on all of the principal and on four times as much again, is sufficient for domestic whisky. It amounts to over 20 per cent. a year on the principal.

Now, if under the law you keep this whisky a given length of time free of charge, what additional expense accrues to the Government if that time be extended to an unusual length? What additional expense would there be? Certainly nothing for renting warehouses. The distiller has to furnish the warehouse. And nothing for enlarging warehouses, for if an increase of goods takes place the distiller himself has to enlarge the warehouse. If he blocks up the warehouse with a given amount of goods, and keeps them on hand for three, six, ten, or fifteen years, he knows in the ordinary course of trade that so long as he keeps it it improves with age and he gets back his money with interest. He could keep a Government warehouse-keeper there during all that period watching that stock of whisky. The Government would be at the constant expense of the salary of the keeper. Therefore, in the application of the just principle of collecting the tax when the commodity goes into consumption, and of protecting itself against any expense which accrues to the Government because of the commodity being for a long period withheld from consumption, it adopts the usual form of charging interest in a safe way on something to cover that unusual expense. It is then simply not to lend the man money, but to protect the Government against the accumulation of warehouseman's charges.

That is the correct view to take of it, and when so viewed it is not offensive, but the form we have to put it in of interest is at first glance delusive and deceptive. But the custom is our universal practice, and it should not militate against one commodity more than it does against another. If it is a "loan" to one it is a "loan" to all. Every article that enters our custom-houses is treated that way. The truth is it is a loan to nobody, and the proposition here is to stop the Government from raising enormous forced loans from one class of her citizens, and a loan, too, for which she pays no interest. Certainly justice would require either that we should not collect taxes prematurely or that we should pay interest upon the drawback of which we have had the use. The simpler way is not to collect prematurely. I need not enter upon the proposition of protection from having to watch small stocks, which is easily remedied, if not already provided for.

Therefore, what is the demand of this industry? It is not protection; it is not relief from any natural infirmity; it is not relief from any custom or regulation that applies to any other commodity that the law has put upon it; it is not to free it from tax, but it is simply that it be placed upon the just and customary principle of taxation; that the collecting of the tax be so modified as not to violate the acknowledged laws and practices for deriving revenue by internal taxation, and thus not only give this class of our people their just dues, but also the Government a better system, and the business machinery of the country, especially the monetary system, less friction.

Now, sir, there is some embarrassment to those who would advocate this matter that may arise from misconceptions on the part of people throughout the country. They would like to know why, if this claim is so just as to induce these people to come here and demand extension for a given number of years, it does not require extension for an unlimited number of years. One of the embarrassments of this bill is that it does not demand enough in the way of extension. We know in the last Congress with only twenty-nine dissenting voices in the House of Representatives the bill for unlimited extension was passed. That would be a logical bill going to the logical end of this matter, and the people could readily understand it. I would be much better satisfied if, while it protected the Government by some interest or other clause which accomplished the same end from undue expense in the way of warehouse-keepers's salaries, it would give an unlimited period of extension. This would not only be more readily understood by the people, but it would be the end of this matter and in every way better for the Government and the whole country.

Gentlemen may say this claim has come here before, but if it be a just claim, why ought it not to have come here before? They may say it will come here again. If it is a just claim why should it not come here again?

I say, for my part, it ought to have come, and it ought still to come until it gets from Congress a recognition of the proper method of laying and collecting the tax. But to prevent these people from coming here for what would be class legislation, namely, a repeal of the interest charged under this bill, I would have the interest paid quarterly in advance. But that will come up when amendments are in order, and I am informed that the friends of the bill are willing to accept that amendment.

We know there is good sense and right spirit in the frequency of just appeals. We know the widow who was disregarded by the unjust judge by solicitation achieved her rightful demand, and although these people have none of the generous sympathies of the country that does not deprive them of the prerogative of asking for what is justly their due.

We have heard a good deal also about this being a ring. Perhaps the greater part of the legislation of this country and of most countries is born of prejudice. Many of those who are most able in directing public sentiment never fail to play upon those magic chords. Sensible men always attempt to achieve a common right by association and organization. A ring! What kind of a ring? Are they coming here seeking to avoid taxation? No, sir. Are they coming here seeking anything that was not unanimously recommended by the Ways and Means Committee of the last Congress? No, sir. Do they come here and ask for anything that was not indorsed by the last Congress with only twenty-nine dissenting votes in this House? No, sir. They must proceed in some organized way. We have heard much of lobbies around Congress for unjust causes. Would it be wrong for men to assemble here to urge what is right? I think not. Yet I am free to say that if there is a man in Washington lobbying for this cause I have never seen or heard of him. If these people have and are now exerting themselves systematically and constantly it would argue nothing against their cause or against this bill, but it would simply show that they are alive to the only known way of achieving results. I would commend them for it. Anything less would make them ridiculous to sensible men.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman explain why it is that these people raised $700,000 to be used in elections in the States to put their bill through Congress?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. That has nothing to do with the merits of this bill. I suppose they were endeavoring to get what they believed were their honest and just rights.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The testimony before the Windom committee of the Senate, in 1882, is the evidence on which that statement is made.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. That has no relevancy.

Mr. WILLIS. I have the report of the Windom committee in my hand, and I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the whole spirit of the report is directly to the contrary.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. What does that matter? Suppose it were true. Suppose they raised $1,400,000 in place of $700,000, as the gentleman says. Can he point to any improper use of money? I dare say they raised some money. How much or how little I neither know nor care. That is no business of mine. Suppose they had even bribed men. I would have contempt for them. That act would prejudice their case; but our duty still would be to consider this bill upon its merits. But bad men should not be permitted to withhold justice from good men. Even a criminal must have his dues. But no wrongdoing is attached to these men. The Republican party has often raised money, directly and indirectly, and properly and otherwise, to carry elections. The Democratic party has attempted to raise it at times. It takes money to organize and bring out a party's vote. It is only by elections that people can send men to Congress to contend for their rights. It may be a proper and legitimate question that they want to bring before Congress. Their rights and interests may be at stake.

This, then, is not a ring in its offensive sense. Contrast it with other organizations and efforts that we are familiar with. There has been a whisky ring, one that the gentleman will recall at Saint Louis and Chicago. That was a ring in its most offensive sense, organized for plunder, organized for the robbery of the Government.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now, the gentleman alludes, if he will permit me again to interrupt him, to the whisky ring of Saint Louis and Chicago, which he admits was organized for purposes of plunder——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Admit it! I charge it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now, I ask him whether under the operation of the present law, what is known as the Carlisle bill, it does not give to the distillers just as big a steal as they could have made themselves? And they do not have to steal it now.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. If it is a bill which within its provisions gives these men the benefit which the gentleman from Kentucky refers to, they get it honestly; but if they obtained it, as in the instances to which I have referred, when it was withheld by the law, then it comes within the terms of what you may properly call a steal. That is all there is of the question.

Mr. WILLIS. Here is the report of the Windom committee on that point.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I care nothing for that. It has no bearing upon the merits of this bill. There is nothing that attaches to this claim in the nature of a ring in an odious sense; and I drew that comparison not to make a partisan point but to protect this bill from prejudice by comparing these business men with what gentlemen regard as a ring in the sense that I assume those who refer to this as a ring desire us to understand by it. In that instance the motto should have been, "Let no guilty man escape." In this instance the most eminent bankers and business men in the Union are urging the passage of the bill. It is strange that some gentlemen can not distinguish between a ring of men to violate the law and steal from the Government and a body of people who openly and boldly come before Congress for a redress of grievances. Do you expect them to sit still under proscriptive legislation and be ruined? Is it wrong to urge and petition Congress for redress? Our fathers did not think so, for they sacredly established this high right in the Constitution, which says: "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging * * * the right of the people * * * to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." Are the open petitions upon our desks a wrong? The cry of a ring is misplaced here.

I have given what I consider the first blush appearance of this case, and I have tried to state the seeming appearance in its worst and strongest light; then I have tried to state the true status of the question. In going over this ground I have treated of some collateral points, and have indicated the practice as well as to some extent the principle of taxation that ought to obtain. I will, however, ask the attention of the House a little more particularly to what I consider the determinating principle that should guide us in this legislation. It should be treated, Mr. Chairman, simply and solely as a question of taxation and revenue. It should not be argued here upon the line of the humanities. The business receives no gratitude for the taxes it has paid. Gentlemen can not invoke our support upon that ground. While we can not and ought not to foster this business, yet it is equally unconstitutional and mischievous for us to seek by national legislation either to extinguish or to persecute it. The national function is revenue. The people do not want us to exceed our functions or powers. The States reserve to themselves the social question. They can legislate upon the social and humane features of the question; but we should confine ourselves to the jurisdiction they have given us to tax for revenue, leaving to them what it is our duty not to encroach upon—what in their superior wisdom they have reserved for their own management.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. As the gentleman was kind enough to permit interruption I hope his time will be extended.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I would like to have fifteen minutes longer.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I thank the House and the gentleman for this courtesy. As I was saying, that is the function of the National Government, revenue. For the lack of some better expression I will lay this down as an axiom, in the light of the Constitution and of common sense, that national taxes should be laid solely with reference to revenue, and they should be so laid and collected as to yield the required revenue at the minimum cost of collection and at the minimum degree of interference with the social and industrial well-being of the people.

Some may think that we fail to interfere with the well-being of society if we refuse to pass this bill. They should remember that the result of that course is to force down the price of whisky by retaining a persecuting clause in the law, which defeats their own ends. As soon as the cheapened whisky has killed all the men and ruined all the happy homes it can and the excessive supply has been exhausted, then the price advances. Then they begin to hope for some cessation of their saturnalia of drunkenness and crime. Why? Because whisky has advanced. If high whisky stops it, why will not high whisky prevent it from starting? If cheap whisky increases drunkenness, why defeat this bill and make whisky cheap? But you think the whisky makers will be bankrupt and no more will be made. The distilleries will not be burnt down. Creditors will have bought them up at a sacrifice and they will not keep them as idle property. As soon as the market advances so as to guarantee the prices that will prevail if this bill passes, then they will start to making whisky again. You will only then have recovered your lost ground; but you will not have repaired the ruin to society that you will have wrought. If you continue such a law as we now have and these new distillers in the course of years should forget the old lesson and you refuse to pass some such bill as this, then you simply do the same injury to society over again. As long as people want whisky and are able to pay for it and a State permits it to be made and sold, just that long will men be found ready and able and willing to make it.

I only make this argument for those who need it. Most of the temperance men know that society and temperance do best when left at home. They know that Congress never touches those things but to blight them. They know that the Constitution forbids our touching them. They know that if we had the power to regulate whisky drinking we could allow it as well as prohibit it. Every community that is now secure in temperance would run the risk of losing it. They would be very apt to lose it. If the Constitution forbade the making of whisky we would have to leave it to the States to enforce the provision. They would do then as they do now, which is just as they like. If the Government attempted to enforce it it would take a police force of half a million of men. They would be subject to no local influences or authority. They could force open and search every home in the nation. If honest, the policing of Russia would not be equal to the tyranny. If dishonest, as nine-tenths of them would be, then the day of whisky rings would just have begun. The whole thing is impossible, and any action by us upon this line is different in mischief only in degree, and the further we go the worse it is.

Now, upon the other hand, some gentlemen may agree with me in my premises as to the determinating principles in laying this tax and yet hold that the least disturbance to our monetary and general business matters will be realized by defeating this bill. In my statement of the true and exceptional status of the relations in which this business stands to Congress I revealed that we have restricted their equal right and chances to export, which is unconstitutional, and that ought to condemn the law as it now stands. I revealed that to hold, say, $20,000,000 of this commodity for either the domestic or the foreign market it takes in all an outlay of, say, $120,000,000. The interest on all of this amount must be lost by the producer for three years before he can afford to market the higher grades of goods. It is no advantage to any merchant who wants money, or to any farmer who wants credit of the merchant, to find that the banks have got so much money locked up in whisky, advanced before market day to the Government, and the banks must either stand out of that money for years, waiting for the time that the Government ought to wait for, or else see good customers go to the wall. The more they have to advance prematurely to the Government for these customers the less they can do for other customers. Thus times are made hard all around. Clearly the Government by its rapacity in forcing taxes before the article is sold to the jobber or shipped abroad is not only acting in violation of the Constitution but also is deranging the whole order of business.

We are to consider the facts as they exist and treat them dispassionately; and because there happens to be a coincidence of interest between us as a nation and between them as individuals and a class, we should not swerve away from a sensible and proper line of legislation. I never had any admiration for the spirit of the dog in the manger, and still less for the man who cuts off his nose to spite his face.

What is the attitude of the House now upon this question? It divides up into some singular and strange elements. When this question came up on its merits in the last Congress it received an almost unanimous support for an unlimited instead of a partial extension of time as is now asked. But, sir, we find now that there are powerful political forces moving beneath the surface of affairs. We find gentlemen here who maintain that this industry is subjected to such an iniquitous and unconstitutional burden in the matter of the tax, that the tax upon whisky is so wrong, that it ought to be abolished altogether. And yet, sir, they are not willing to come here and adjust that tax in a consistent and customary manner. They are willing to give it complete relief, but they are not willing to give it partial relief. They argue that because the tax is unconstitutional therefore it must also be made unbearable. That is a strange condition of mind for gentlemen to be in. The country will not understand or approve of this.

And it is not only most of our friends upon the other side of the House who occupy that position, but there are also some of our brethren upon this side of the House who occupy it. And there are some gentlemen on this side who talk of this being class legislation, when it is the reverse of class legislation. It is to relieve a class of a piece of class legislation. It is in full and entire accord with revenue reform.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Excuse me. I have not time. Some upon our side denounce this tax as a wrong and yet refuse to mitigate what they call a wrong. If they can not get complete relief for their friends, ought they not to try and get partial relief? They ask for no more. What is it that can so warp gentlemen's minds? They are honorable men. I have not a syllable to say against their integrity. But I consider their position strangely mixed and inconsistent. They know perfectly well that the representatives of this bill upon the floor are in accord with the claimants. They know the repeal of the tax is not asked for by them. Why exceed a man's wishes or else try to starve him? You want them to ask for repeal of the tax. But they can stand the tax; it is upon a luxury; they are willing to stand it. They know that to repeal this tax is to keep up high prices by means of a high tariff upon the necessaries of life. Their convictions are opposed to this. Do you wish to enslave their opinions as a condition of giving them only a part of what you say they ought to have? My distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] I believe is willing to kill this tax all at once, as he expressed himself the other day. He looks upon it as a wrong upon this country and perhaps upon the people engaged in it as victims.

Mr. RANDALL. If I understand the gentleman, I never said that.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Did not the gentleman say it is wrong? I heard him say it is unconstitutional, which I would call wrong.

Mr. RANDALL. I said all internal-revenue tax should be wiped out; but I never said the people engaged in the manufacture of whisky were engaged in a business derogatory to their character.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I did not dream or intimate that you had said that. The gentleman does not allude to my point.

Mr. RANDALL. I said, and I repeat, and I hope to have a chance of saying it over and over again, that I will struggle to wipe out the internal-revenue system altogether.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is exactly the point, and the gentleman opposes this bill. What is the logical effect of that striking down of the internal-revenue system? These men do not ask you to strike down the internal-revenue tax. They simply ask you to modify one of the improper features in the collecting of the internal-revenue tax. It will not yield a nickel less of revenue. It will not cost us a cent on earth. It simply makes the day of payment come when it ought to come. These people believe there should be high whisky as long as there are high-priced coats and high-priced boots and shoes. They know if the internal-revenue tax were repealed to-morrow the advance on whisky would be very great in this country and they would make millions of dollars on the stocks they have on hand now. The consumption that would be stimulated by this overflow of whisky through the country would entirely exceed the present supply, and the 90 cents a gallon would now and for a long time to come be about equally divided between the consumer and the producer. This would be the end of their appeals here. They could afford to retire. There are 80,000,000 of gallons of alcohol and of whiskies in bond now. Upon this these men would get an extra profit of not less than $40,000,000; more than half of this would go to these immediate petitioners. All that they could produce for a long time to come would yield them fabulous profits. A regular sluice-way would be opened from the Treasury to refund the tax upon unbroken packages, as we have just passed a law to refund upon tobacco. Under a graduated system of ultimate repeal these profits and rebates would not be voted to these men.

But these men have their convictions; they refuse to accept the condition. What temptation on earth can be laid before men to exceed this? It is as if they were taken up into a high mountain and all the riches of the world exposed to them and offered to them if they would only bow down and worship this idol of protection. What is their reply to my distinguished friend when he offers them this vast gift? Their reply is: "Get thee behind me, for it is written thou shalt worship only justice, and the people and not corporations shalt thou serve." That is the reply, with all honor to them who make it. They do not ask for a repeal of the tax, only for a change in its manner of collection; but they will stand all before they will surrender their convictions.

As the country contemplates the burdens which rest upon the people it will be deeply moved at this offer and plan of adjustment. It will not indorse such methods in public business. While gentlemen do not and can not so intend it, yet in morals and in truth it is a bribe. In politics it is an immense inducement for these people to change their political convictions. It stands colossal in its awful baldness, unequaled by anything known in the history of the world.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. For a question, yes.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is not the fact that in 1880 there were only 2,800,000 gallons rye and bourbon whiskies in bond, and now there are 64,000,000 gallons in bond?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And the tariff duties were then higher than now, for they were reduced at the last session.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I do not want to know or consider anything about that now. I am not arguing for a change in the amount of the tax. I do not know what you mean. It may be a digression. I have chosen my line of argument and can not answer the question, and I must beg the gentleman not to interrupt me.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. With all respect to the gentleman, it bears directly on this question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Pardon me; I want you to believe that I do not know anything about it. I shall vote for this bill because it is just, because it is in the line of revenue reform, because it tends to raise the maximum of revenue at the minimum of cost to the Government and at the minimum of disturbance of the social and industrial well-being of our people, remembering that this is not a whisky bill but it is a revenue bill, and that what might be eminently proper and wise in a State Legislature is mischievous and unauthorized in the Federal Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. YORK].

Mr. YORK. I desire to say in the outset to the friends of this bill that I voted to take it up for consideration. I believe that every measure presented here should be considered. I believe these men should be heard, and therefore I have cheerfully voted to consider this bill.

But I say that if my people do not obtain some relief in the end I shall be compelled to vote against this bill. I shall watch the interests of my people with a jealous eye. While I am willing to vote to grant relief to the large distillers in the West, I propose that the poor men who operate distilleries in North Carolina shall also have some measure of relief.

In my part of the State, in Western North Carolina, there are thousands of poor men, farmers who own little orchards, and they have been crying for twenty years for relief, have been appealing to the American Congress for relief, but none has been extended to them. Now I say to gentlemen on the other side of the House, why should we not join hands in this matter? If the distillers of the West are crying for relief, why shall we not grant relief to every man on the American continent from the odious exactions of the internal-revenue law? I want to see that whole law wiped out. I want to see the people free from all the war taxes. I would be glad to vote to wipe out every one of those taxes, and relieve the people from the burdens which are now imposed upon them.

I propose in my vote upon this bill to act in accordance with the vote that shall be given upon the amendment which I propose to offer to relieve the producers of fruit brandy in my part of the country. If that amendment shall be adopted, then I shall work cheerfully for the passage of this bill. But if it is voted down, my duty to my people will compel me to vote against this bill, and I must do so. I want it understood here that the people of North Carolina are as anxious for and worthy of relief as are the people of Kentucky or of any other section of this Union. I want to see relief granted to them. My heart goes out to the people of the country who are suffering under the burdens of this law. I feel for them and desire to vote for this measure. But I repeat that unless my people shall have the relief which they desire I shall be compelled to vote against this bill.

As I have remarked, we have in North Carolina thousands of little orchards, the owners of which are not able to pay the tax levied upon the brandy distilled from their fruit. They have appealed over and over again to Congress to grant them relief. Our Legislature has time and again petitioned Congress for relief, but none has been given. I say here that if these poor people in my district and in my State are to be crushed down by this law and to have no relief granted them, I can not consistently vote to relieve the people of other States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

I thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] for the time he has given me. I desire to give notice to the House that at the proper time I shall offer an amendment to this bill of the character I have indicated.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the law of March 28, 1878:

> The tax on distilled spirits hereafter entered for deposit in distillery warehouses shall be due and payable before and at the time the same are withdrawn therefrom and within three years from the date of the entry of the deposit therein.

This movement for the extension of the whisky tax commenced with the passage of the law I have read, and the legislation which is now asked is the proper supplement to it. I desire to call attention briefly to the manner in which the enactment of that law affected the production of the peculiar class of whisky for which relief is now asked.

Mark you, in 1878 that law was passed. In the fiscal year commencing January 1, 1879, the production of the peculiar whisky, bourbon and rye, which is benefited with aging increased 7,000,000 gallons. In the fiscal year commencing January 1, 1880, there was an increase on the preceding year of 24,000,000 gallons. The next year there was a still further increase, the production being 5,000,000 gallons more than in the preceding year. Will the advocates of the pending bill tell us that the manufacturers of this article during those years did not understand fully that they were more than answering the demand for the consumption of their product?

Let us look a moment at the character of the whisky now in bond. Of the 80,000,000 gallons in round numbers which remained in bond on the 30th of June, 1883, 55,841,741 gallons were bourbon whiskies and 17,894,219 gallons were rye whiskies. So that of the whiskies now in bond over 70,000,000 gallons are the surplus of production for the fiscal years 1880, 1881, and 1882, placed in bond under the three years' extension act solely for the purpose of being held to improve by age; and this was the object in passing the law of March, 1878.

You will find, Mr. Chairman, that other classes of distilled spirits do not to any considerable amount remain in bond. They are produced as they are required for consumption. But the act to which I have referred was a part of a scheme, a part of a plan, acted upon by the distillers of bourbon and rye whisky to place in charge of the Government without the payment of tax that product which would improve by age. It is a well-known fact that these whiskies will further advance in value by aging largely in excess of the interest on the cost of production and wastage.

And we are asked now to enter into partnership with the producers, and in practical effect to loan them the money with which to carry the whiskies for two years longer. If the great distilling interest of the country were about to be struck down, perhaps it might come here with some show of reason and ask that clemency be extended to it by Congress. But, sir, it is this peculiar whisky which is consumed as a beverage, and that alone, that makes the appeal. The producers of distilled spirits which enter into use in other manufacturing industries or the arts are not here; but the manufacturers engaged in distilling whisky to be used as a beverage solely, they, and they alone, are here.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that he is mistaken. The Western Export Association, whose average daily capacity is 200,000 bushels of wheat, is to-day a petitioner at the bar of this House for the passage of this bill, and every high-wine establishment in the country joins in the appeal.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, this bill involves the loan by the Government of $60,000,000; and I do not wonder that the parties who are to receive this loan have induced the branch of industry mentioned by the gentleman to unite in their petition. It is not surprising if that branch of industry sympathizes enough with those engaged in the production of the bourbon and rye whiskies to stand as their friends to aid them in the passage of the bill. But will the gentleman from Kentucky tell me that any interest except the bourbon and rye whisky interest will be benefited by the passage of this bill or requires this legislation for protection and to save it from ruin?

Mr. WILLIS. I do say so, emphatically.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then, I say to the gentleman, if he is correct the reports on our tables from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are certainly false. They do not warrant any such deduction as that; for it is an obvious fact that, apart from these two peculiar whiskies, distilled spirits are removed from bond in quantities equaling their manufacture; the consumption is as large as the production from year to year.

I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that in the normal condition of things there would be a profit of 25 per cent. at least above the interest on the cost of production in holding the whisky for aging alone; and Congress is invited by these people to engage in that particular business, holding whisky for improvement in value.

We have been told that banks and bankers, business men everywhere, are petitioning for this bill. Considering the loan of sixty-five or sixty-six millions of dollars is involved at 4½ per cent. interest per annum, I am not surprised; I am only surprised that the petitions are not more numerous.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that it is not a measure of relief which is being sought. We are asked to engage in a speculation. We were asked to engage in this speculation when the act of 1878 was passed. These gentlemen engaged in the manufacture of whisky knew at that time that they were manufacturing far beyond the annual demands of the market, far beyond what was required for consumption. Take the production in the State of Kentucky. In 1879 it was 8,000,000 of gallons. In 1880 it jumped up to 15,000,000 gallons. In 1881 to 32,000,000 gallons. In 1882 it was 25,000,000 gallons. Does the gentleman from Kentucky tell me that the people there did not understand that they were then manufacturing annually far beyond the use by consumption; nearly double the consumption?

Mr. WILLIS. Eighteen millions is the annual consumption.

Mr. HISCOCK. The production of Kentucky?

Mr. WILLIS. Eight millions.

Mr. HISCOCK. Eight million gallons was the highest production for years in that State; but in 1880 it jumped up, as I have already said, to 15,000,000; in 1881 it advanced to 32,000,000 of gallons, and in 1882 it was 25,000,000 of gallons. I supposed the normal demand for this whisky was some fifteen or sixteen millions of gallons at the outside. The gentleman says 18,000,000 gallons.

I will accept his figures that 18,000,000 gallons is the demand for it in a normal condition of things. Yet it is conceded Kentucky was producing it far in advance of that figure. And there was not a single one of these manufacturers but was advised monthly of the product of the distilleries of the country and of the amount going into bond. Each one of them appreciated the fact of the increasing production. Operating under this law of March, 1878, they expected to induce the Government to enter into business with them, and to hold their whisky for aging purposes, holding it for appreciation in value, and they trusted to be successful in the effort they are making here to-day, that they would be able to procure the Government again to extend the bonded period, fully appreciating, as I have said, the increased value which would come to this product by the lapse of time.

Now, sir, it is not a question of crushing out an industry, confronting the fact as we do that this year these same distillers have produced about 14,000,000 gallons. Having produced that large amount, nearly up to the annual consumption, I do not believe the ruin which has been threatened here for two years is so near to them as is claimed by the gentleman from Kentucky. I do not believe it is so impending. They doubtless believed they would have force enough in this House, force enough in Congress, to extend the time in which whisky could be held in bond from three to five years. They have doubtless expected when the five years came round they would have strength enough to repeal the limits entirely, if necessary, in order that they might hold this whisky on speculation, but their industry is not more oppressed than others in the country.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to discuss this question, as it seems to have been feared on the other side it would be, as a moral question. But the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means when he brought in this bill told us that whisky was different from anything else. I have scarcely heard a gentleman on the other side announce himself as in favor of striking off from it the internal-revenue tax. The fact that they are unwilling to assume that position demonstrates that whisky manufactured for use as a beverage is different from our other products. There is no other internal-revenue tax which I am unwilling to vote to repeal, but I would not vote for a repeal of the tax on whisky. There is no sentiment on the other side of the House in that direction.

Sir, it is the fact that it is a different commodity from anything else. Yet in this commodity, as a matter of profit to the owners of it, you ask the Government to become his partner and receive for its share of the profits 4½ per cent. per annum.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you know of a single party petitioning relief from this tax who favors the repeal of the tax?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not.

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir, because it is a source of profit to them.

Mr. WILLIS. I know hundreds of them, thousands of them.

Mr. HISCOCK. At least in the hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means I was not aware any gentleman took the position that he was in favor of striking off this tax. I believe the gentleman from Kentucky announced that he was not.

Mr. MORRISON. Those who were before the committee owned no whisky and paid no tax except on the whisky they drank. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK. There were a number of gentlemen before that committee who pretended to represent, and I believe did represent, the whisky interest of the United States. I think the gentleman will bear me out in saying that at least the gentleman from Pennsylvania attempted to discover whether they were in favor of the repeal of this tax or not.

And I believe, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has intimated that he does, that they are not in favor of the repeal of the tax. They are in favor of its being laid—these producers of bourbon and rye whisky—as a matter of speculation, being willing to pay the Government 4½ per cent. per annum for its share of the profits.

It has been said by one gentleman upon the floor that he was in favor of this bill because it would be in the interest of protection. I refer to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD]. Perhaps that statement deserves a passing remark.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I am something of a protectionist, and I have yet to discover any other manufacturing industry of the United States that favors the striking off of this tax or the postponing of the collection of the tax in the interest of protection. But they are opposed and I am opposed to this peculiar industry being singled out from all the other industries of the country, from the iron industry, from the cotton industry, to receive this peculiar protection.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, the great iron-workers should come here and ask of this Government a loan of money to them at 4½ per cent. per annum, asking the Government to become partners with them in their enterprise. Would it receive any countenance from any member of this House?

Mr. TUCKER. Let me ask my friend from New York if he does not see a marked distinction or difference between the attitude which this whisky interest occupies and that which the iron interest occupies. The iron interest comes here and asks the Government to lay a duty upon iron for their benefit. The whisky interest only asks that the Government will not press them by a tax upon it, which can be collected as well hereafter as now, and for which the Government has no immediate need.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Virginia misunderstands the position of the iron industry. A year ago we passed a law under which the iron industries of the country entered upon their business for the present year. They have not come here and asked anything at the hands of this Congress except to be let alone. They have simply asked to be allowed to act under the law that in March last we passed—a little more than a year ago. But the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia is to refuse them protection, not even to allow them to retain what they already have, but to strike it down, and then to enter into a partnership with the distillers of bourbon and rye whisky, by which the Government should receive 4½ per cent. per annum for its share of the profits.

Now I yield ten minutes to my colleague from New York [Mr. RAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has thirty-two minutes remaining.

Mr. RAY, of New York. Mr. Chairman, a distinguished lawyer, in giving advice to his son, whowas just to enter the profession of the law, once said: "When the facts are against you, argue the law; when the law is against you, talk about the facts; but when both the law and the facts are against you, talk around."

The advocates of this bill are proceeding in accordance with this advice. Finding the law, the facts, the justice, and the morals of the case all against them, they have very innocently and in a manner at once childlike and bland commenced to descant upon the imaginary beauties of free trade, the alleged enormities of protection, and the assumed evils of the internal-revenue system. We are blandly informed that the taxation of whisky and tobacco are relics of the war, and in childish innocence they tell us that if we would have an era of happiness, prosperity, peace, and plenty, we must blot out every law that savors of the "late unpleasantness," and smoke the pipe of peace and drink each other's health with untaxed tobacco and whisky.

When gentlemen who pretend to oppose this bill, yet who are in fact laboring for its passage, improve their opportunity to denounce our internal-revenue system and advocate the abrogation of the tax on distilled spirits, I think I discern that beneath the sophistry of this bill there is hidden a deep design to ultimately remit this tax altogether. Therefore it is that I find a new reason for opposing this measure.

We can attach no blame to those men who as interested parties are seeking an extension of credit from this Goverement and urging the passage of this bill. They have the right to come here and urge their claims. We are bound to give them a fair hearing and to duly consider and pass upon the merits of their case, if there be any merit in it. I have diligently sought for merits in this case, but have sought in vain. I fail to find a single reason for the passage of this bill. On the other hand, I find many reasons that impel me to oppose it.

Mr. Chairman, if I correctly understand the position of the gentlemen who so earnestly advocate the passage of this bill, they desire to enable those persons having distilled spirits entered for deposit in distillery warehouses or special bonded warehouses, and upon which the tax has or shall become due after December 1, 1883, to retain the same in such warehouses for a period not exceeding two years longer than is now allowed by law without payment of the tax.

The reasons urged for the passage of this act are that there has been a large overproduction of distilled spirits, whisky principally, and that it would ruin or at least seriously embarrass distillers to pay the taxes in advance of consumption or in advance of a demand in the market at present prices.

In an address presented to the Committee of Ways and Means the distillers interested in this question say:

> It is well known to your honorable committee that there are now in distillery warehouses many millions of gallons of distilled spirits in excess of the immediate wants of trade, upon which the taxes are falling due from month to month. It needs no argument on our part to convince your minds that this state of affairs must, in accordance with the fixed laws of supply and demand, result in a great depreciation of values, and heavy losses to the owners of those spirits, if their withdrawal from bond is still made compulsory; and that the decline in prices will be accelerated from month to month in just such ratio as the market is more heavily overloaded.

These same interested gentlemen present figures which show that 73,847,103 gallons have been overproduced and now remain in bond. It is claimed that it is our duty to allow these millions of gallons of spirits now in bond there to remain without payment of the taxes due, or that soon will become due, on their paying 4½ per cent. interest thereon. In other words, they seek to make this Government a great national whisky storehouse, and ask the Government at the same time to loan them hundreds of thousands of dollars at 4½ per cent. interest.

They, in substance, say that having largely overproduced, having overstocked the market by their own want of foresight, the Government should now step in and relieve them from the consequences of their own indiscretion, loan them the money that is its due, and aid them in their struggle to keep up the price of distilled spirits. They seek to make us at once a bank, a storehouse, and the protector of the whisky ring.

To excite our sympathy they urge that since the establishment of the present internal-revenue system in 1862 the Government has collected in taxes upon distilled spirits the enormous sum of $1,017,754,129; and one gentleman in his love and adoration for the whisky of this nation held it up as the national preserver.

Sir, I will only pause to say to him that as against armed rebellion we can protect ourselves, but that as against the slow, insidious approach of the whisky destroyer that is debauching this people we have little protection if we single out the whisky producers as the loved and cherished sons of the Republic.

It will never do for this people to cement and solidify and arm and equip this great and grasping liquor monopoly that is sapping the life of the people in one direction while it feeds the Government in another.

Sir, I am willing to admit that this Government has derived an immense revenue from the tax on distilled spirits, but I deny that we owe any debt of gratitude to distillers. I deny that we are under any obligations to take them under the protection of this Government and enable them to prosper and profit and enrich themselves while we leave every other industry upon its own merits and to regulate its own values by production in accordance with the laws of supply and demand. I do not believe it just or proper or moral for this Congress to so legislate as to encourage the production of distilled spirits. The laws as they now stand have been upon the statute-books for years, and the producers of distilled spirits have manufactured and placed in bond with full knowledge of the law, with full knowledge of the consumption of the country, and with full knowledge of the burdens they were imposing upon themselves if they overproduced. They well knew that the price of any commodity is regulated by the supply and demand, and they well knew that the tax was fixed by law at a certain sum on each gallon manufactured, and that the tax was to become due and payable at a day certain. They also well knew that any overproduction was at their own risk unless Congress should relieve them.

When they manufactured this whisky, they of course estimated the cost. Labor, material, and the Government tax all entered into consideration, and into their estimate of the cost of their product. It was for them to watch the market; it was for them to regulate and run their business. The Government has but one duty, and that is to enforce the law and collect the tax.

In my judgment there is no more reason for our extending the time for the payment of this tax than for extending the time for the payment of other debts and obligations due the Government. If we enter upon the policy demanded by this bill, that of extending the time of the payment of taxes and dues owing to the Government, I can not see where nor when we are to stop. The importer, the dealers in tobacco, and all who pay internal taxes are expected to pay the duties and taxes promptly when due, and whether they are bankrupt or rich, in debt or independent, are questions the Government can not stop to inquire into. Upon no other system can we safely and prosperously conduct the affairs of this country.

From the reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue these distillers knew that there was a large overproduction from year to year, and yet they went on overproducing. In 1878 the overproduction was 14,088,773 gallons; in 1879, 19,212,470 gallons; in 1880, 31,363,864 gallons; in 1881, 64,648,111 gallons; in 1882, 80,963,645 gallons; in 1883, 80,000,000—resulting in the enormous aggregate overproduction of 290,276,068 gallons; and the figures show that this annual overproduction has been steadily increasing. Yet these men went on overproducing and now come to the Government for relief. No fault can be attributed to this Government. The responsibility rests with the producers.

The figures show that in the last six years there have been produced in the United States of distilled spirits 515,969,400 gallons. Used here, 377,469,928; exported, 67,188,601; leaving in bond, 73,847,103. There are in the hands of wholesale dealers 13,921,482 gallons; in the hands of retail dealers, 28,180,650 gallons; showing to-day a surplus of 115,949,235 gallons of distilled spirits manufactured in our country, now in our midst, to carry woe, misery, want, degradation, crime, destruction, and death to the homes and firesides of our fifty millions of people.

This is more than two gallons for every man, woman, and child in the country, saying nothing of the thousands of gallons of imported distilled spirits or of the millions of gallons of fermented liquors manufactured in our country and imported from abroad, and which would swell the aggregate of intoxicating liquors in our country to an amount sufficient to float the Navy of the United States. And yet this liquor interest, representing hundreds of millions of dollars capital, comes here pleading poverty; this big, fat, sleek, trouncing, overgrown, strong, aggressive whisky baby comes crying at the doors of this Congress asking us to make this Government its wet-nurse. [Laughter and applause.] Sir, the child that begs to-day for succor will soon be larger and stronger than the father, mother, nurse, and all.

Now, sir, I have looked a little into the questions of the annual consumption of food-producing material in the manufacture of this immense amount of distilled spirits, and I find that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, there had been used in this business as follows: Of wheat, 291,368 bushels; of barley, 73,380 bushels; of rye, 2,987,473 bushels; of corn, 13,428,469 bushels; of oats, 122,583 bushels; mill-feed, 240,340 bushels; other materials, 22,203 bushels; making a grand total of 18,644,787 bushels of food annually manufactured into distilled spirits in the United States alone. There was also used in the same business 2,373,106 gallons of molasses.

When we think of the thousands of poor and starving people this would have saved from suffering we find the figures appalling. True we can not perhaps enact and enforce sumptuary laws, but while we can not prescribe what people shall or shall not eat and drink, we can refuse to foster and encourage this liquor traffic by refusing to lend to it the credit of the Government. Upon the men and upon the political party that assist to make this bill a law will justly rest the condemnation of the people of this country.

Sir, I have no desire at this time to read this House a lecture on temperance. I have no desire to speak a harsh word of any person engaged in the manufacture or sale of distilled or fermented liquors. But I do desire to say that if the traffic could be wholly destroyed it would be the greatest blessing that could come to this people. It would add to our material, intellectual, and religious wealth, and add immensely to our self-respect and national strength. The people of this country could well afford to buy the grain that is manufactured into spirits and give it to the poor and hungry if we could wipe out this widespread and devastating curse of intemperance. For these reasons I urge that we can not afford to specially protect and foster the manufacture and sale of liquors, the indirect effect of which is to curse and degrade and impoverish our people.

If the iron and lumber industries overproduce we do not legislate to protect them and keep up prices; if the stockman overproduces we pass no law for his relief; if the importer brings in too many goods from foreign ports we enact no measures to exonerate him from the payment of import duties that he may keep up prices and sell at a profit. Then why do gentlemen expect us to single out this one industry, the whisky traffic, of all others, and protect it from the natural and inexorable laws of supply and demand?

Sir, the request is presumptuous and ought not to command the attention of this House for a single hour. But they tell us that a large quantity of these distilled spirits have been pledged as a security for loans. In other words, bankers are loaning money upon the security of whisky in bond, using it as a basis for a large banking business. Are we to encourage this at the expense of our national pride and dignity and morals and honor? Is whisky to be the real basis of a large national-bank circulation? This proposition is a long step in that direction.

Sir, if our bankers have loaned large sums of money upon the security of bonded spirits, if manufacturers have overproduced and borrowed money to carry on the business or to pay the tax on the spirits already in the market, upon themselves must rest the burden, if burden it be, and also the responsibility. It is not the fault of this Government, and if we are to protect the zeal and indiscretion of bankers and distillers, then should we open wide the door to protect the zealous and improvident importer, merchant, and farmer. Sir, when I commence this kind of legislation it will be with the farmers, merchants, and mechanics.

The owners of these spirits say that so long as the spirits are in bond the United States has a lien thereon for the tax. True, in addition thereto they propose to give a bond. Thus as security for this debt which they owe the Government (about $65,000,000, now or soon to become due), they pledge us the whisky and their bond. I do not doubt the security, but I denounce the principle. As substantially stated by my able colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] who has just taken his seat, it amounts to nothing more nor less than for this great Government of high ideas and morals to enter into a copartnership with the whisky combination, putting in $65,000,000 in cash and receiving 4½ per cent. as its share of the profits—profits that are to be wrung from the consumer at the expense of the dignity of this Government, and amid the cries of the besotted and the wail of suffering humanity. Sir, before we do this let us collect in the money, and, if we are to become money-lenders, let us loan to the farmers at 4½, or any less per cent., taking their bond secured by a mortgage pledge of their real estate. This, at least, would be honorable, clean-handed business, if not wise and judicious.

But we are told that if we force the present payment of these taxes we shall injure the revenue of the Government; that we shall ruin the distillers and destroy the business; that we shall force this immense amount of spirits into the market and largely reduce prices; that the owners will be compelled to sell at ruinous rates. The argument is specious, but not forcible; attractive, but not convincing.

The demand will be in accordance with the wants of the consumers, and men will always be ready to manufacture what the people demand. We shall at all times receive the legitimate tax on this product that the laws of supply and demand render necessary. Upon the other branches of the argument I have already spoken. Having produced the spirits, let the distillers pay the tax and take charge of their own property, selling or holding as the supply and demand warrant. This is the rule we apply to all other kinds of business, and to vary it for the benefit of these men would be not only immoral but criminal. Sir, I am prepared to believe that behind this proposed legislation lies an immense job, and that it is expected, even at this session, to reduce the tax on distilled spirits to at least 50 cents per gallon. If this proposed and expected reduction should take place and should be applied to the whisky now in bond—and it is expected that it will—these distillers, or the owners of the spirits, will be the richer by $29,538,841, and the Government will be that much the poorer.

Strength is given to this argument when we find the advocates of this measure not only attacking the internal-revenue system, but at the same time asserting with great heat and vehemence that the Government does not require the money, that there is no purpose to which it can be applied, and that if paid it will only keep $70,000,000 out of the hands of the laboring classes and locked in the Treasury vaults. This is the doctrine of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], who I take to be the exponent of the "true inwardness" of this bill. He announces, first, that he is a "high-tariff protectionist," and second, that the true temperance law is "to provide that any man who sells you adulterated liquor or adulterated wine should be sent to the penitentiary for life."

Sir, I suppose that he advocates this doctrine as "a self-protection" measure, and in that I quite agree with him. But when it is asserted that we have no use for the millions of dollars, our due from the tax on these spirits, I take issue at once. For the alleged protection of the Treasury our Democratic friends have cut down the naval appropriation recommended about $8,000,000, and they have refused to appropriate anything to add to our small and insignificant Navy. At the same time they concede that we are at the mercy of any maritime nation that sees fit to attack us. There is not a great city at any port on our thousands of miles of seacoast but can be laid under contribution or burned to ashes. The postal appropriations have been cut down $4,000,000 under the plea of economy, and this service must languish and our people be delayed in the receipt of the mails.

The next blow is to be aimed at the Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Education; and I am informed that there is not an appropriation for the maintenance of this great and wealthy Government but is to feel the stingy grip of this penny-wise, pound-foolish policy. In this very Capitol thousands of useful and instructive books are packed away or scattered about by the cord, of no use to any one, for the want of a library building in which to place them. Yet, on the plea of poverty, to the shame and disgrace of Congress, even that is denied us. Thousands of men, who fought for four long years in sun and rain and blood and tears to preserve this nation and who are now in absolute want, plead in vain for help from this Government because it is said that to pension them would bankrupt the Treasury. Appropriations for the general education of the illiterate are denied on the same ground. Still, with all these fields wherein surplus money can usefully be applied, we hear gentlemen asserting that the whisky interest should be relieved from its obligations because the Treasury is replete with money.

Sir, let us increase the post-office and mail-service appropriations to a figure that the actual wants of the people demand; let us build and arm a respectable navy, that shall enable us to enforce as well as declaim the Monroe doctrine and resent the insults of European despots; let us enlarge and strengthen our coast defenses, build up navy-yards, improve our rivers and harbors, encourage American shipping, lend a helping hand to every agricultural and educational enterprise, establish the postal telegraph, thereby the more firmly uniting ourselves as a people and aiding in the rapid diffusion of intelligence and the interchange of thought at small expense, pension the needy and deserving soldier, his widow and orphans; let us do all this even if it does draw upon the public Treasury; ay, let us erect in this capital city of the best and freest country of the world a magnificent national library building, for the use not only of Congress but of the whole people. And when this is done, and the national debt is provided for, and ample provision made for the support of the Government, and when all other internal taxes are removed from the necessaries of life, and when import duties are reduced to a purely protective and revenue-only basis, then we will reduce the tax on whisky and tobacco—on tobacco first, on whisky last.

But gentlemen tell us that it would be better for this country to take off all internal-revenue tax; that the people would be more prosperous and more happy. We are told that we have high internal taxes, high import duties, and a large surplus revenue. The gentlemen who advocate this doctrine seem to forget that under the present system this people have prospered as they never before prospered and as no other people have ever prospered. They seem to forget that the wise and the provident lay up a surplus for the rainy day.

Some of the advocates of this measure favor the entire abolition of the tax on whisky and tobacco, and some would go so far as to strike off all import and export duties. They would have absolute free trade.

When we strike off or even largely reduce the tax on distilled spirits we must increase the import duties or else resort to a direct tax upon the people for the support of the Government. Certain gentlemen seem to entertain the idea that when whisky is free and the tax-gatherer is abroad among the people gathering in a direct money tax that the millennium will have indeed come. This may be good doctrine for the distillers, for the liquor dealers, but it is very poor and very destructive doctrine for the people and for the moral and educational interests of the country. It would aid that class of men who purchase with the price of a day's labor 90 cents' worth of whisky and 10 cents' worth of bread for family use, and then wonder what they are to do with so much bread; but to the great mass of laboring, sober, industrious people it would work great harm and prove burdensome. If the tax on whisky and tobacco is required for no other purpose, let us apply it to the support of education, the relief of want and misery, to the purchase of clothing for the naked and of food for the starving.

If the continuation of this tax shall result in the destruction of the rum traffic, so much the better for the people, for civilization, for education, for religion, for progress among the nations. The men engaged in its manufacture will seek and find other fields of labor; the capital invested in the manufacture of distilled spirits will find other paying business, and the corn and grain of all kinds used in the business will be perhaps cheapened for the laboring people. The farming interests would not suffer, for the grain would go to the increase of animal production, and the decrease in price if any would be more than made up in the saving of taxes now paid for the support of the almshouse, the lunatic asylum, the jails, and State prisons. Remove the curse of intemperance, and the court expenses of this country would be reduced one-half, and peace, plenty, happiness, and contentment would reign supreme in the homes now made desolate by this great evil.

But we shall be told that this is idle, sentimental talk; that it is not practicable, and that we are to deal with the question of distilled spirits as a purely business question. That we must look at it in the light of profit and loss, and ignore the moral aspects of the case.

With the sober-minded, thinking people of this country the question of temperance has already become a practical question, and to some extent a political one. It reaches to their homes and firesides, to their pockets, to the peace of communities, and to the stability of the Government itself.

I am looking at the question in the light of profit and loss to the whole people, and not to a single State or community, nor the manufacturers and dealers in alcoholic spirits.

I shall never give my vote to aid or encourage the manufacture or sale of distilled spirits or alcoholic liquors of any kind for other than medicinal or mechanical purposes. With my last breath will I protest against any action by this Congress that shall lend the aid of this Government to the protection of the liquor trade.

There is no business in this country so rich and powerful, so grasping and aggressive, as the liquor interest. Its combinations are alarming and its influence beyond comprehension. What we gain in taxes for the support of the General Government we lose in the wealth of individuals, in the moral degradation of the people, in the increase of pauperism and crime, and in the direct tax upon the people in the several States for the support of the almshouses, inebriate and lunatic asylums, jails, and State prisons. Gentlemen may figure out the profit and loss at their leisure, but they will find that the simple rules of arithmetic substantiate every statement that I have made.

When we enter upon the discussion of the question of high or low tariff, or of no tariff at all, we take up a subject not now before the House. At a proper time I may desire to be heard on that question. Under high protection this people are prospering and growing rich and intelligent. In every free-trade country capital owns labor; here labor owns capital. In every free-trade country labor is starving, kept in ignorance, and degraded; here labor is well fed, educated at the public expense, and ennobled. We have no aristocracy of money or of blood, but an aristocracy of brains, of intelligence, of labor, of mechanical genius. Every section that has availed itself of protection has grown strong and rich and intelligent. High tariffs do not depreciate wages; wages are not cut down by tariff laws; high tariffs do not foster monopolies; they are not inimical to enterprise and labor.

We have a high tariff and wages are high. Labor is better paid, more highly educated, better fed and clothed, and more contented and happy in this country than in any other place on the face of the earth. We have less monopolies than any country of like wealth and position on the face of the globe. Our people are more enterprising than those of any other country. Facts assert it, figures prove it, and history has written it.

At first blush our farmers may think that protection to men who manufacture iron and steel and cotton and woolen commodities is not protection to them and their interests. They are liable to say, "If by a high tariff you keep up the price of these things and other merchandise which we purchase, you do us and our industry positive harm." If a home market for the products of agriculture was not desirable and absolutely necessary for the prosperity of the farmer there would be some reason in the proposition.

To create a home market there must be consumers, and these consumers must be able to pay good prices, and that they may do this they must have employment at good wages. This employment must not be tilling the soil, for that would simply add to the supply of farm products and make them cheaper. Therefore there must be manufacturers and factories and employés, who, receiving good wages, are able to purchase at good prices the corn and wheat and other articles of farm production.

This is what a high tariff does for the farmers. It more than doubles the value of what he produces and sells, while it adds but little to the cost of the useful and necessary things he buys, so that the balance is on the side of the farmer every time.

We are thus able in and of ourselves to employ and feed all our people and keep running every kind of business, and to keep at home the money, the wealth we should otherwise pay out abroad for the very things we now manufacture at home. As we keep the money at home and it is paid to our laborers and merchants and mechanics, it adds daily to the wealth of the country and is evidenced by the white, vine-clad cottages on the hillsides, by the school-houses at the cross-roads, by the churches at every town, and by the bank accounts of laboring men. It shows itself in the rosy-cheeked children, the happy housewives, the well-filled larders, and the neat wardrobes of our laboring classes, as contrasted with the pale, puny, ever-hungry children, the careworn mothers, the empty cupboards, and the ragged clothing that are the companions of the half-paid and half-starved laborers of free-trade Europe.

The people know and appreciate these things, and when in November next the great political parties of this country go before the country on this issue they will write their verdict by no eight-to-seven vote, but by a majority that shall be as eighty to seven in favor of protection to home industry and American labor. [Applause.] When westward the star of empire no longer takes her way; when the pauper labor of free-trade Europe no longer seeks the shores of protective America for homes and food and an equal chance in the battle of life; when the labor of America seeks the free-trade fields of Europe; then and not till then will we adopt the free-trade doctrine of Democracy.

I am glad that the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has rung up the curtain in the drama of Free Trade vs. Home Industry and American Labor. Let the play, in which he trots to the front the American hog as a living evidence that our home productions require no protection, go on. When the curtain is rung down in November next it will be to Republican music, and the Republican party and a fresh Republican administration will be called to the front of the great American stage to receive the plaudits of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask the attention of the committee for a few moments only, while I present such views as I have upon this question and my reasons for opposing the bill. It is manifest to us that the question is not only a complex one, but it is also a complicated one. It is a triangular question, a question with three aspects.

In the first place we have the business aspect of the case. In the second place we have its revenue aspect. And in the third place, to a great many of us, it has a moral aspect.

First, in regard to the business aspect of the case, there are four classes that are very greatly concerned in the result of the action of this body in regard to this bill. First are the producers—the distillers; secondly, the middlemen—the holders and bankers who have loaned upon this security; in the third place there are the retail dealers and consumers; and in the fourth place the general public.

Now, first, as to the distillers—the producers. When they went into this business to produce this overstock of whisky which it is now asked that the Government shall assist them in carrying, they did so with their eyes wide open, with a full and complete understanding of all the risks they were assuming, of the danger of overproduction, and with a full understanding of the tax which the Government had against it, and the probabilities of the extension or non-extension of the bonded period. Now having gone, as a speculation, into this business, into the manufacture of this product which they well knew, and we all well know, requires time for its aging and perfection, and where the holding of it would be for their pecuniary advantage, they come to us now with a very poor grace to ask us to help them out of the embarrassments of their business speculation.

For my part I do not believe to the full extent in this cry of distress. They have overproduced. There is no doubt about that. They knew they were overproducing when they did it. There is no doubt about that either. They knew all the risks they were taking in their overproduction, and it comes, as I before said, with poor grace from the producers now to come to this Congress and ask that we shall become partners with them in their speculation, help them out of their difficulty, and take 4½ per cent. interest on our money as our share of the profit. So much for the producers.

In the second place, we have the holders, the middlemen, and the bankers. Those who hold this product have taken it, I assume, in the main, and almost entirely, since the passage of the internal-revenue tax law and the previous bonded extension laws.

The bankers who have loaned money upon this stock of whisky also did it with their eyes wide open, knowing fully all the circumstances, knowing the fact of overproduction, knowing the period of extension, and knowing the measure of tax and every other element that entered into the question of the financial speculation which they undertook when they either purchased this whisky or took it as security for loans. They discounted all this when they invested. I say, therefore, that these middlemen and bankers come here with an exceptionally poor plea when they ask us to step in and take a share of the speculation, to assume a part of the risk, and to take 4½ per cent. of the amount of the tax as our share of the profits.

I come next to the third class interested in this matter, the consumers and the retail dealers. I undertake to say that the consumers and retail dealers have no interest at all in favor of the passage of this bill, but are interested rather in the retention of the present tax and the present bonded period. Their interest certainly is to have cheap whisky, and they are therefore not interested in the passage of this bill. It may not make whisky more scarce or more dear, but I trust that it may break the compact power of that dangerous ring which more than once has corrupted the administration of the Government, at times too near to the center of power and influence.

Before coming to the next and last class, the general public, I wish just at this point to say that the fact of this great overproduction and accumulation of stock in the whisky trade has been brought about designedly for the purpose of controlling the market. In other words, it is used for the purpose of establishing a monopoly, in order that this great reserve of whisky may be held in hand to be thrown upon the market when needed to control it, or to be withheld from the market when that is necessary to keep up the price. In other words, it is a monopoly as complete and much less reputable than the great Western Union Telegraph Company in its line or the Standard Oil Company in its line. If these men are exposed to risks and losses, they have exposed themselves to those risks and losses by their own act.

I come now to speak for a moment of the general public. It is said that the failure to pass this bill will affect business generally, that there will be a falling off, as was said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] the other day, in the consumption of corn for instance. And he warned my brethren from Kansas and Iowa that they would be burning their corn for fuel again before long because the consumption of corn for this purpose would be so greatly reduced. He named 10,000,000 bushels per year as the amount of this falling off.

Now the gentleman from Kentucky knows that that is a phantom without body, a shadow without any substance. In 1880 the production of corn in the United States was over 1,754,000,000 bushels. The gentleman tells us that last year the consumption of corn in the manufacture of whisky was reduced by 10,000,000 bushels, about one-eighth of 1 per cent. of the entire production of corn in the country and less than 3 per cent. of the production of Illinois alone. And the reduction in the consumption of corn for the manufacture of whisky to the amount of one-eighth of 1 per cent. is to bring a business panic upon the country, if we may believe the gentleman from Kentucky.

To state the proposition is all that is needed to answer it.

As to the banks, when we compare the small amount invested in this bonded whisky, as compared with the vast volume of our banking capital, the prospect of a business panic from this source is equally absurd.

There is no demand from the general public for the extension of this bonded period.

In my boyhood days I was accustomed to see what we called scarecrows set up in the corn-fields. But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] has set up an exceedingly shabby and very thin scarecrow in the corn-fields of the gentlemen from the great Northwest, but it will not scare them to any serious extent. For if this corn is not used for making whisky, it will be used for bread. But it would seem that the gentlemen think it a pity to waste so much corn on bread when it could be made into good old bourbon whisky, especially if the Government will only hold it while it gets its age!

What is the proposition now before us—this business proposition, as it is called? It is that the tax now overdue and about to become due, in other words, a part of the revenue of the Government, shall be reloaned by the Government to the whisky ring in order to assist them in their speculations and in their attempt to control the market.

I had expected when this proposition was considered that some gentleman would rise in his place upon this floor and denounce it as unconstitutional; would denounce as unconstitutional the proposition that the Government should engage in a speculation in whisky. When we proposed to improve the Mississippi River, to so control and curb the great "Father of Waters" that from its fountains to the sea it should roll peacefully, beneficently, and not as a terror to those who dwell upon its banks, we were told that there was no warrant in the Constitution for that.

And a little later, when it was proposed to pass a law to stay the ravages of pleuro-pneumonia among the herds of our agriculturists in the East and in the West, we were again told that such a measure was unconstitutional. And when we proposed, a short time later, to make an appropriation to save the sufferers from the overflow in the Ohio Valley, we were gravely informed that there were serious doubts about the constitutionality of such a measure of relief.

But when it is proposed to loan anywhere from forty-five to seventy million of dollars for two years, at 4½ per cent. interest, to the whisky ring, I have heard no one raise a voice here to say that it was unconstitutional. It is unconstitutional to try to save men from being drowned with water, but it is strictly constitutional to save them from being drowned in whisky!

For my own part I am not anxious about the Constitution. As Macaulay once said about the English constitution, "it has been ruined so many times that it has become used to it; it thrives upon it." With the great American eagle above it and the Supreme Court standing behind it to support it, and with 54,000,000 of loyal hearts ready to fight for it, I am not anxious about the Constitution. Adapting itself to our growing power, our increasing wants, and our advancing civilization, it is destined to survive in transcendent vigor our fears and anxieties, and to exceed our most sanguine hopes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. I hope I may be allowed three or four minutes more.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I thank the gentleman and the committee for the courtesy.

Again, I am one of those who believe that the whisky trade is not one to be fostered or favored by our legislation. It is the great national waste and the origin of our greatest national want. This traffic and its resultant evils constitute the great poisonous cesspool of American civilization.

The eminent gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] who sits before me in advocating this bill described this business as "a great industry," "a valuable industry." Mr. Chairman, it is a great industry; but it is the devil's own industry! The men who grow the corn, the men who distill the grain, the men who handle and carry it, as well as the men who vend and consume the product, are all simply contributing to this great national cesspool. It is "an industry" worse than wasted. Into this cesspool are cast the life, health, fortune, reputation, and homes of hundreds of thousands of our people. There are mingled murder, debauchery, drunkenness, beastliness, and every crime. And the whisky ring fosters and preserves this cesspool for the sake of a market.

But we are told that it brings us revenue. That is true, and this revenue belongs to this Government now. If it is collected now, it is secured for the benefit of the whole people. If it is not collected now, it will never reach your Treasury; it will never clink in your coffers.

Mr. WILLIS. Why does my friend want to take revenue from such a disreputable source?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have not time to answer that question. Hire a hall and give me half a day and I will tell you. [Laughter.]

There are "millions in it." There is too much involved to make it safe to delay or tamper with it. A corruption fund of $50,000,000 is something that no honest government can afford to have lying around loose. "Repeal" is already the cry coming up from different directions—first, from those who want cheap whisky; and second, from those who want reduced internal revenue. This cry will increase until the corruption fund will triumph and whisky is free. But we are told our Treasury is already overflowing. It is true, and we need it to be full. If this Congress has the courage and manliness to do it, we will soon put this revenue in circulation to good purpose.

1. Let us attack the vast amount of illiteracy and ignorance and consequent vice in the land by the encouragement of national education.

2. Commence an American navy worthy of this Republic.

3. Improve, restrain, and control the Mississippi River until it shall cease to be a terror to those who dwell along its banks, and until it shall become by art, as it is by nature, the great vital artery of the Republic and the great curb on overgrown monopolies.

4. As this nation is, we hope, to be perpetual, let us begin now a system of adequate public buildings, until this Government can conduct its own business under its own roof in every town of 10,000 population in the land.

5. If there be still a surplus, then the coast defense and some fostering care of our merchant marine may claim a share.

And last, but not least, provide more liberal pensions for the widows of those who fell in defending the nation's life, and the maimed and crippled heroes who still linger, incapable of competing in the strenuous race of life.

In the language of the gentleman from Colorado, "unlock the Treasury," put its surplus wealth in circulation, to bless our country, through needed and legitimate expenditures, and fill the channels of business.

Mr. DUNN. Would it not be better to reduce taxation?

Mr. CUTCHEON. But no man and no party can gain either honor or success on the cry of "free whisky." Let us have the courage which belongs to this hour and place, and stand up against this gigantic monopoly, this monstrous temptation to corruption. In the language of the distinguished Senator-elect from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], "He who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts" (or dodges) "is damned." [Laughter and aplause.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that gentlemen who have in this discussion favored the passage of this bill have from the very first indulged in a series of remarkable exaggerations. In describing the interest involved they give it an attitude that it is not entitled to. They tell us that it has paid more than a billion of dollars into the Treasury of the United States, a radical mistake of nearly $200,000,000, the exact receipts in the Treasury from the tax on spirits from 1863 to the end of the last fiscal year being $841,073,975. They speak of it as one of the most extensive of the "industries."

Mr. Chairman, there are only a little more than 6,000 people in the United States engaged in this "industry." The wages paid are $2,663,967 a year, and the capital employed is but $24,247,595. At the ordinary Iowa price for the 18,000,000 bushels of corn last year consumed, the whole sum expended for corn would be but slightly in excess of four and a half millions of dollars.

Gentlemen have told us that this great "industry" controlled the markets for corn and fixed the price of that staple. This sounds very strange to my ears. They tell us, too, that unless this bill passes there will be a falling off in the consumption of corn next year of ten millions of bushels, and the consequence will be ruin to the agricultural interests. Why, Mr. Chairman, did you ever recall the utter insignificance of the relation this industry bears to the corn production of the country? The corn crop of 1879 was an unusually light one. But in that year there were produced, as is shown by the census report of 1880, no less than 1,754,591,676 bushels. The state of Iowa alone has produced in one year more than 300,000,000, and two counties in the district I have the honor to represent have in a given year produced more than 18,000,000, the equivalent of the whole quantity consumed by all of the distilleries in the United States in the manufacture of spirits in the year 1883. The stoppage of every one of the 844 distilleries would have no more effect upon the price of corn than the passing summer shower would have on the back of a duck.

There are almost as many laborers engaged in the two "industries" of making pickles and preparing patent medicines as are employed in the great "industry" of making distilled spirits, and the sum paid them as wages is very nearly the same. Surely, in the labor aspect of the case, no one would contend that irretrievable ruin would come upon us if the compounding of patent medicines and the preparation of pickles should be numbered speedily among the lost arts.

We have been told, Mr. Chairman, that the entire country is clamoring for the passage of this bill. One enthusiastic gentleman informed the committee that "every member of the House had received hundreds of telegrams urging the passage of the bill." Hundreds of telegrams! That seemed startling to me, and I made inquiry of the twenty gentlemen who sat nearest to me and found that seven only had been received. A pamphlet has been laid upon our desks in which are printed those sent the chairman of the committee, and I find that through them but eight cities are represented. This, perhaps, is a trivial matter, but it serves to show the spirit of bluster and exaggeration with which the passage of this measure has been urged, and the measure of false pretense there is in the constant insisting that there is a great and spontaneous demand for it coming up to us from all parts of the country.

Again, Mr. Chairman, we are told that unless we pass this bill and give the holders of whisky now in bond and on which they have been granted a period of three years in which to pay the tax of 90 cents a gallon two additional years, the entire "industry" will be ruined; that the distillers will be bankrupted, and that in their fall they will pull down banks, capitalists, and all manufacturers, involving the country in a period of panic and financial chaos such as we have seldom, if ever, witnessed. Most dolorous songs have been sung and most gloomy pictures have been painted of the wreck and ruin to be wrought upon all of our business interests in case we obdurately refuse to give these gentlemen who are engaged in whisky-making two years' longer time on their rapidly maturing indebtedness to the Treasury. We have already given them three years. That stands for naught. Hitherto they have had all granted that they have demanded. Past leniency does not placate them; they must have two years of extension, or financial hell is to be painted on the skies of the future by them.

Well, Mr. Chairman, that is what they told us two years ago. Their prophecies and threats were then as terrifying in their character. All were to be involved in ruin if they did not secure the passage of a bill quite similar to the one under consideration. Yet the bill was not passed, and the panic did not come. Even they went quietly about their business, manufacturing largely in excess of the possible consumption and piling up the vast quantities of spirits that are in the bonded warehouses. They had the remedy in their own hands, had they seen fit to use it. If, two years ago, when they began to raise their clamor for this additional two years of extension, they had checked or stopped the production there would not have been in the hands of the Government 80,000,000 gallons for which there is no satisfactory market.

But the truth is, Mr. Chairman, they did not want to cease production. Their great want is to postpone the payment of the tax. The product of the still is unlike the most of manufactures. Its market value is largely enhanced year by year, until it becomes "ripe" at the end of six years. Malt liquors and tobacco of all forms deteriorate in value. Whisky increases in value. If the manufacturer can avoid the payment of his tax for five years his relative gains are wonderfully increased. Nearly four gallons of spirits are produced from a bushel of corn. The "slops" fed to cattle and hogs pay for the cost of manufacture. So that the Western distiller produces his spirits at a cost of from 10 to 15 cents per gallon. There is a very great difference between the value of the ripe whisky and its cost. This difference pays a most desirable interest on the 10 cents or 15 cents of cost, but of course will not pay such desired interest if to the 10 or 15 cents of cost there is, at the date of manufacture, added the 90 cents of tax. Hence his anxiety to secure the extension provided for by this bill.

But there is still another possible advantage to the distiller from the three years of postponement that he is now allowed. Under the regulations as they exist there may be allowed for shrinkage in each barrel seven and a half gallons, on which he is not required to pay any tax. Experience has shown that the actual shrinkage is three and one-half gallons. If he secures the larger amount of seven and a half, he makes a clear profit of the tax of 90 cents on each of four gallons, a sum sufficient to pay the difference between the interest proposed by the bill under consideration and the bank rate which he may have to pay in case the bill does not become law.

It is claimed that there are 45,000,000 gallons of spirits that may be affected by this bill in excess of the probable demand for consumption on which the tax must be paid within the next two years. Let us assume that an equal amount must be paid in each of the years, or a little more than $20,000,000 each year. Under the terms of this bill he will have to pay as interest to the Treasury $900,000, at the rate of 4½ per cent. But suppose he is not permitted to borrow this money from the Government, and is compelled to go to the banks, as other business men are, and is compelled to pay a bank rate of 6 per cent. He then would have to pay for his accommodation but $300,000 more. It is claimed, however, that there is a difficulty in procuring extensions from the banks—the sum is so large. It is admitted that the bankers are now carrying the distillers for the sums to-day invested in the bonded spirits, but it is said that they can not or will not carry them for the cost and the tax. The statement that they can not is simply ridiculous.

The 5,140 private banks of the United States have a capital of $232,435,330; the 2,501 national banks have a capital of $509,699,787, giving us a total banking capital of $742,135,117. What a mere bagatelle this $20,000,000 is in comparison with the capital of the banks, that at this time is so earnestly seeking investment. The banks will be glad to make the loans if the security is good. It is admitted to be good security now. Will it not continue to be after 90 cents of actual cash value is added to each gallon of spirits by the payment of the tax? The friends of the bill say that it will be abundant security in the hands of the Government, in case it becomes the creditor. Will it not be in case the banks are the creditor? If not, then that is an additional reason why the Government should not go into the business of discounting in this irregular manner. There never has been a time in our history when there was such plethora of money in the banks nor a time when they were more anxious to loan it at fair rates on sufficient security. If they decline to allow the distillers to continue to be their customers, this fact should stimulate the caution of those whose duty it is to guard the public Treasury and induce them to look with ever-increasing distrust upon the specious propositions of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, the distillers have now the remedy for the evils they foresee in their own hands as they had two years ago. Let them stop the production of spirits, and long before the two years have expired there will be a demand and a market for every one of the 80,000,000 gallons now in bond and on hand. If there is to be distress and bankruptcy, they will produce it by their own recklessness in tying up their capital in a production largely in excess of a demand.

Mr. Chairman, ever since this debate began, and by every speaker supporting this bill, we have heard over and over and again repeated that the manufacture of whisky was a "legitimate industry," a "legitimate business." No one has attacked its legitimacy up to this time. No one has arraigned it. Gentlemen have seemed to fear that such attack might be made, and have hastened to parry before a blow was aimed. The honorable chairman of the committee in presenting the bill referred to the "legitimate" character of the great industry, as though anticipating dissent. In the sense that by the Federal law it is not proscribed I am willing to concede its legitimacy, and to the extent of the 18,000,000 gallons of alcohol and spirits that are used in the arts and medicines I am willing to concede legitimacy; but, sir, I am not willing to go further.

Legitimate industries are those that bring blessing to mankind; that lift the burdens from toiling men and women; that bring comforts; that feed, clothe, warm, and enlighten them; that brighten their lives and remove the shadows of care. They clear the forests and subdue the prairies; they build our cities; they bridge our rivers, carry railways across continents, work our mines, fill the air with the hum of spindles and the music of anvils; they mark out paths for commerce across oceans, and light the skies with the eager fire of countless forges. They make man better, happier, and give him gradual approach to the perfect standard of his Maker. I have yet to learn, Mr. Chairman, that measured by these standards the manufacture of whisky could be classed with "legitimate industries."

It has been said that this class of manufactures during the days of the war kept our armies in the field, preserved the national credit, and enabled the Government to put down rebellion. Another has said that they erected the splendid public buildings that adorn this city, and have kept the business of the country from stagnation by giving to our farmers a market for their corn.

Mr. Chairman, I am not willing that such vaporings should go unchallenged. No distiller nor any other man pays any portion of the tax on spirits except on that quantity he consumes. It is the consumer who ultimately pays the tax. The distiller but advances it. Up to the close of the war the total revenue raised from distilled spirits was but little in excess of $46,000,000; not enough to meet the expenses of the Government for fifteen days of war. This "industry kept our armies in the field!" Oh! no, sir; not the armies of patriotism. It was powerless to do that. But it did recruit some of our armies. It has ever been most efficient in recruiting the armies of crime, the armies of pauperism, the army of drunkards, unfortunate children of its thrift, that every year, many thousands strong, fall into dishonored graves.

"This industry erected our splendid public edifices!" Yes, Mr. Chairman, unfortunately it has. But not our capitols, not our seminaries of learning, nor yet our schools of art. It has erected our jails and poorhouses, our insane hospitals, and our penitentiaries; and here and there a gibbet is seen in the land that it too has erected. Whatever there are of the sad sights that may be seen in this otherwise bright land of ours, these are the fruits of this "industry." Is it a broken and dismantled home; a wicked life of wife or husband; a group of hungry-eyed, ragged children; a crowd of youths, neglected, drifting in idleness and ignorance crimeward; the ignorant criminal classes, withholding their quota of labor from the aggregate that produces the wealth of the State, who increase the expenses of him who bears his full share of the burdens of government; the classes who retard progress and make doubtful our civilization—if these sights are seen, or any of them, we may point with almost unerring certainty to this "legitimate industry" as the agency that has made possible scenes like these in every hamlet and town and city of this otherwise blessed country of ours. Except for the 18,000,000 of gallons used in the arts the "industry" might cease to be and no man would be the worse for its disappearance. But all men in every strata of society would have added prosperity, added blessing, additional hope. We are so knit together that every man is made to feel the woe it is laden with. In some way or other it comes home to each of us, and always with a curse. No day ever dawned upon nation or people brighter or more fraught with blessing than that good day coming when the evil flowing from this "industry" shall by wise prohibitory laws, backed by a more perfect civilization, be driven from the land.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY.]

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Chairman, the subject of this bill has furnished the motive power of so many speeches, maiden and otherwise, that I feel like beginning mine with a protest that whisky is not its inspiration, but only its theme. As Burns says:

> Inspiring bold John Barleycorn,
> What dangers thou canst make us scorn!
> Wi' tippeny we fear nae evil;
> Wi' usquabae we'll face the devil!

[Laughter.]

It so happens I have been brought into frequent official and professional contact with this much proscribed commodity, and in that way have learned a good deal of its economic as well as of its legal bearings.

The first tax imposed was 20 cents on the gallon, and took effect on the 1st day of August, 1862, under the provisions of the act of July 1, 1862. Under the provisions of that act, however, all distilled spirits were allowed to be deposited in bonded warehouses, and only paid the tax when they were withdrawn for consumption or for sale. This tax of 20 cents a gallon by successive acts was increased to the enormous rate of $2 a gallon, just ten times more than the original rate and about ten times the cost of the production. But in each of these successive acts the right was still preserved to put a tax on what has been properly called the consumptive demand.

This unnatural ratio, Mr. Chairman, between the rate of the thing taxed and the cost of production produced this unnatural result; a result which had been produced in every other country in the world, and that was an attempt to evade the tax on this production, which in turn induced a corresponding effort on the part of Congress of a stringent kind to enforce the collection of the tax.

Now the general result of this conflict of force was the act of July 20, 1868, and the distinguishing feature of that act is that it attempted to tax a thing, as it were, before it was born. Because it levied a tax upon at least 80 per cent. of the producing capacity of the distillery as estimated by the survey, and then it levied a tax upon the thing itself the very moment it was born. Now, sir, in the second section of that act this unborn subject of taxation was christened and it was not christened whisky there. By no means. It had a much more euphemistic designation. It was christened somewhat after the fashion of the love writer of the Chicago Tribune. They called it ethyl-alcohol or hydrated oxide of ethyl, or spirits of wine, and then it was provided that the tax, the very moment this thing came into existence, whether it existed in a pure or a simple state, as a separate, detached substance, or whether it had passed over into or was commingled with some other and foreign substance, the very moment of its existence the tax became a part of it, and followed it in every subsequent change and transformation until it was finally discharged by payment. I affirm without fear of contradiction that of all the articles that have been scheduled as taxable under our internal-revenue system, from the time it took effect on the 1st of July, 1862, to the present time, whisky is the only one of them all that was compelled to pay a duty the very moment it had a statutory existence.

Stringent, however, as this act of July 20, 1868, was, desperate as it was in its efforts to put down the conspirators who then threatened the integrity of the Government, it still recognized the true principle in respect to taxation; because it did not attempt to collect the tax the very moment it trickled from the worm, but it gave the producer and manufacturers of this article a year within which to pay the tax. Why? Why was a year necessary? In order to find a market; in order to obtain a customer; in order that the article might adjust itself to the law of supply and demand. So that while this very act of July 20, 1868, made a wide departure from previous legislation upon the subject, and did it in the effort to make a desperate lunge at the men who were then defrauding the Government, yet still, although it got off its center of gravity and lost its balance a little, it righted itself finally, turned up like a sober man, and planted itself upon the true and sound principles of taxation, providing that a year at least should be given within which to withdraw the spirits from bond for use and consumption. Now, succeeding Congresses have extended that period, and the simple object of this present bill is to grant a further extension for another period. Before we denounce this as class legislation, by which a particular class is exempted, before we determine upon the nature and character of the exemption, we must clearly understand the nature and character of the restriction. First, let it be remembered that it is the law which imposes the restriction; that the burden is an artificial one, not a natural one; and that it is one which is clearly and entirely subject to our modification and control.

I hear it said that other manufacturers are suffering the ills of overproduction, and that it would not be fair to extend the relief proposed by this bill because they are compelled to bear what fortune sends them without assistance from any quarter.

But they are not taxed. There was a time when iron, cotton, woolens, lumber, everything that was made, was taxed. Suppose that period and that condition of things was upon us again. Suppose your bonded warehouses were crammed with cotton and woolen goods and these were required to be brought out on an overstocked market under a law with this one-year clause. Suppose the banks united with these petitioners and asked you for relief. Suppose they said that a payment of the tax would not only bring ruin upon them, but by the panic caused every associated interest would feel its effects. Suppose they could point you to the fact that there was no occasion for the demand; that the Treasury was full to overflowing; that one of the problems of existing statesmanship was not how to increase the revenues, but how to reduce them. Is there any man here who will say that he would deny relief to the manufacturers of these commodities under such circumstances?

These manufacturers are suffering not from a law of Congress, but from the law of supply and demand, as the distillers and dealers of the country are suffering from both. We can not change the law of supply and demand, but we can the law of Congress; and just there is the difference between the two cases. Take off the tax or postpone its collection and then you will have these classes on the same level. The exemption, you see, then, is to be measured by the restriction. The restriction had its origin in penal and not in economic considerations; the exemption is only a temporary restoration of the statu quo which existed for long series of years before the restriction was imposed. The exemption is not of a class from any burdens which any other class has to bear in common with it, but from that burden which is peculiar to itself, and which belongs to no other class.

Class legislation involves discrimination in favor of one class as against another; but will any man point out how any other class of our citizens will be prejudiced, or in what way the petitioners for this relief will be benefited, by a comparison of burdens left on the one and removed from the other?

If this exemption is allowed, the brewers of distilled spirits are for a fixed period only allowed the same privileges accorded to others, with this difference, that they pay a bonus of 4½ per cent. interest for the enjoyment of the privilege for which the others pay nothing. There is no discrimination in their favor. There is only a partial destruction of existing discrimination against them.

I have listened in vain for an argument against this bill. It is surely no argument, conceding the fact, which is denied, that Kentucky is to be largely the beneficiary? Why should not relief be extended to Kentucky if she needs it and the measure is a proper one, as well as any other State, and if she were the only State in the Union that was interested in it? Why, sir, I can remember the time when, just about reaching my manhood, I first stood upon the soil of Kentucky, when every fiber of my being thrilled with the thought that this was the home of him whose name I had learned to lisp in my infancy, the one household word on every Whig hearthstone in this broad land.

If I had no other feeling for Kentucky the name of Henry Clay would always inspire me with the most generous emotions for that heroic old Commonwealth. No, sir; it is not because Kentucky asks it that it is to be denied. It is because whisky asks it; that is the reason. Every age has its scapegoat, and whisky is ours. I admit that it has done much harm. I admit that it has brutalized men, broken up families, swelled the numbers in our jails, penitentiaries, hospitals, and lunatic asylums. I admit that if I had been making a world filled with men and women with passions such as we have I would have kept whisky out of it. So I would have removed a great many other temptations which are quite as fruitful of disease, unhappiness, and domestic misery as whisky. I would not have let evil into my world at all. No devil should have set foot in paradise of mine. But I have to take the world as I find it. Man has been fond of some stimulant or other in all ages, and I believe will continue so until the end of time, and if he can not get it in a glass, he has been known at times to take it in a tea-cup. [Laughter.] He will have it. Every nation obtains a principal sum of its revenue from taxing this article. Great Britain has been making it pay ten shillings or $2.50 a gallon ever since 1860. It has paid since it was levied here by the act of July 1, 1862, over a thousand millions of dollars into the public Treasury. It is a mistake, I think, to suppose that the consumer under existing conditions pays this tax. Take the case of the owner of one hundred barrels in bond; say 5,000 proof gallons are bearing a tax at 90 cents to the gallon, say $4,500. There is no market for this whisky, but it must come out of bond; the time is up and the tax must be paid. The owner must raise the money if he can not find a buyer for the whisky. As long as he holds it he certainly is out of pocket the amount of the tax, and not the consumer; then at length he sells on a falling market at a loss; the dealer sells to a retailer, and then the retailer to the consumer. How does the consumer pay the tax? Under ordinary conditions he may, but under the extraordinary requirements of existing law regulating the bonded period, if they are vigorously carried out, it will not be the consumer but the distiller who will be forced to pay the taxes.

Now, what is the consequence of this? I say to the lovers of temperance that if they force this whisky out of bond onto an unwilling market the inevitable result will be to cheapen the article and increase its consumption. Why, the crusaders were wiser in their day and generation. They went round and knocked in the heads of the barrels. But our Congressional crusaders propose to set them up. Here are 70,000,000 gallons of concentrated damnation and misery, double extract of woe and perdition, a hell-broth such as witches never brewed, all safely guarded in its reservoir behind walls of impenetrable masonry, and if there are chinks here and there the leakage is comparatively slight, and can only work ordinary and, you may say, normal injury. And you propose to break these walls down and let out this whole fiery, seething mass of corruption and poison in one fell, disastrous overflow! And all in the name and for the sake of temperance!

Why, if the dog is bad, why not chain him up and keep him chained? If you have your pestilence quarantined, why let it loose? Oh, it is whisky! We want to punish the dealers in the nefarious article? The dealers will get it cheaper than they ever had it before.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FINDLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I have understood from the friends of this bill that if this tax is exacted the whisky is to be shipped abroad and the tax thus evaded. That does not seem to agree with what the gentleman from Maryland is now arguing. For my part I am willing it should go abroad and do not care if it never comes back.

Mr. FINDLAY. Why is it you do not care? Suppose it was lumber, would you care?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would not care because we do not want it here.

Mr. FINDLAY. You would care if it was lumber or any other article of commerce.

Mr. MILLIKEN. We make a distinction between lumber and whisky.

Mr. FINDLAY. I suppose, upon the principle of retalliation, you would like to poison the Frenchmen and the Dutchmen because they will not take our American pork.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would rather poison them with the whisky than our own people. But I should prefer to have it shipped to some lone island where there was nobody to use it and let it stay there.

Mr. FINDLAY. Why not adopt the brilliant figure of a former Commissioner of Internal Revenue, then a Representative in Congress, who made his speech at the impeachment trial, and say you would get rid of it by pitching it into a vast hole in the sky? [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. If the gentleman will find such a hole, and we are strong enough to do it, we will throw it there. [Laughter.]

Mr. FINDLAY. And then sing with Evarts, Sic itur ad astra. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I might be satisfied with that, only I think it would be apt to go the other way.

Mr. FINDLAY. It is said when a man takes too much of it he sees stars. [Laughter.] There might, therefore, be some poetic propriety in giving it that course.

But to return from this disgression. It is said, "Well, then, we will punish the distillers, the men who make the whisky;" but how? By breaking them up. But consider that for every distillery you will ruin financially you will bankrupt a thousand souls. You do not want to make whisky cheap; you want to make it dear.

Why, Mr. Chairman, we have it on the best authority—one of the most learned and philosophic writers on this subject, Leone Levi—the time was about the middle of the seventeenth century in England, when gin was so cheap during the high carnival of the dissolute Charles II that the whole population of London seemed given up to the most brutal and besotting debauchery. And then he says it was no infrequent sight to see in the streets of London on the front of some gin shops this advertisement, "A man can get drunk here for a penny; dead drunk for twopence; and his straw thrown into the bargain." [Laughter.] Is that the idea? To make whisky as cheap as gin was made cheap at that time?

I say in all seriousness, regarding the subject from the standpoint of sentiment, and I fear, indeed I know it is viewed from that standpoint by a large portion of the opposition to this bill, the promoters of the temperance cause will do it infinitely more harm by voting against than voting for this bill. They will vote to flood the market with cheap whisky; we desire to regulate the flood with some regard to the law of supply and demand.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. FINDLAY. You have now an opportunity of withholding from the market a large quantity of this pernicious stuff, and a refusal on your part to avail yourselves of that opportunity can not be justified from any sentimental standpoint.

I make no appeal for sympathy. If any poor fellow has made a mistake, even if we could help him, still let him go to the dogs. That is the natural course of things. I do not pity him and will not help him. Thousands of others have made similar mistakes and it is all right.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FINDLAY. But I do have some sympathy with the gentlemen who take theirs in a tea-cup, and who are ever listening for the roll of applause or the thunder of indignation from the dear people, because there is an awful reckoning in store for them when the Salvation Army catches them on their way home and inquires about their lost opportunities. Unfortunately the mode of helping a man along in this world is too often helping him down hill instead of helping him up, and when the inquiry about lost opportunities is made I am afraid that one of those of whom that inquiry will be made will be my honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. FINDLAY. So that I can not help him if I would.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Let me ask a question that bears on the bill. So far as my habits are concerned they will take care of themselves.

Mr. FINDLAY. I was not referring to your habits.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman to refer to them.

Mr. FINDLAY. Not at all.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am glad of that. Does the gentleman mean to say that in his opinion the extension of the bonded period now would lessen the consumption of whisky?

Mr. FINDLAY. Yes.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is it not the fact that when the bonded period was extended in 1880 there were only 2,800,000 gallons of whisky in bond?

Mr. FINDLAY. I thought the gentleman was going to ask a question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. How will the gentleman account for the fact that under the Carlisle bill there are now 80,000,000 of gallons in bond?

Mr. FINDLAY. There is a very simple and a very direct answer to that question.

M. WHITE, of Kentucky. I would like to have it.

Mr. FINDLAY. I will give it, not in figures, but in another way. Everybody who knows anything about business, any man who is familiar with sales, knows that the inevitable, resistless effect of a forced sale of any article is to cheapen its price.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That was precisely the argument that was used in 1879-'80.

Mr. FINDLAY. And it was as good then as now.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. If no better, then we should defeat this bill.

Mr. FINDLAY. It is a perfectly legitimate argument. You have an article that nobody wants; nobody wishes to buy it. You force that article on the market and make the people take it against their will, and they will take it for just what they choose to give and not for what you ask, and the inevitable effect of such a forced sale is to cheapen the article. I say the inevitable effect of agitation on the subject at the present time, which has given rise to the impression in a great many quarters that after all this bill will be defeated, has been to cheapen whisky. And I say you can go into the bonded warehouses in Baltimore to-day and buy whisky in bond, of course the amount of tax taken off, at a less price than it cost to make it three years ago.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have looked at the papers, and I find that whisky in Baltimore is now selling for $1.19 per gallon; while two years ago, when they told us that the country would be bankrupt and ruined if the bonded period was not extended, the price of whisky was only $1.17.

Mr. FINDLAY. I do not know what papers the gentleman has consulted.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I got it from the Post of this morning.

Mr. FINDLAY. I get my information directly from reliable persons in Baltimore, and I believe them, and I do not care what the newspapers say.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The Post is good Democratic authority.

Mr. FINDLAY. I must confess that this cry of the people stimulates in me philosophic reflection, but makes no appeal whatever to my fears. Who are the people? Who is this unknown god whose terrific judgments are denounced here against us with equal glibness and fervor? I believe that the sensible people of this country, looking at this as a pure business proposition, will approve of this House if it passes this bill. I believe that if there are men here who take their fears into consideration, who are all the time summoning up some ghost or phantom which they call the people, they will find that the good sense and the good judgment of the American people will always approve what is right.

As for myself, in a matter of this kind I know of no other divinity than my own conscience. Whatever others may do, I shall consult this divinity, and consulting it I have come to the conclusion to vote for this bill, because I see nothing in law, in morals, or in sound statesmanship which would induce me to do otherwise.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. REAGAN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5265) to extend the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HANCOCK, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CORRECTION OF A BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. By direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and in order to correct a bill which has been erroneously printed, I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That House bill 842, with the report accompanying the same, be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs for correction of the bill in conformity with the report of said committee amending the same.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. BEACH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, requested to furnish for the information of the House a copy of all leases made by him for the use or occupation of any ground in the Yellowstone National Park, together with all rules or regulations prescribed for the guidance of the lessees; also, the names of the superintendent and assistant superintendents of the said park, the date of their appointment and their place of residence when appointed, the time when they entered upon the performance of their duties, and their compensation, and when and how paid, and whether they have resided continuously within the said park from the time of their appointment down to the present time.

Resolved further, That the said Secretary inform this House what buildings, if any, have been erected by such lessees, their location and condition as respects completion, and their estimated value; and in general whether the lessees have complied with the terms and conditions upon which the premises were leased. And also furnish the House with a copy of all rules and regulations made and published for the care and management of the park, and inform the House what provision, if any, has been made to prevent the wanton destruction of fish and game therein, and to what extent such provision has been effective.

There being no objection, the resolutions were considered, and adopted.

EXPENSES OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, asking an appropriation of $10,000 for the expense of defending the United States in the Court of Claims for the ensuing fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BUCHANAN, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. PARKER, for two days.

To Mr. HUNT, an extension of his leave of absence until Monday next.

And then, on motion of Mr. BLAND (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

Mr. SHERMAN took the chair as presiding officer, under the designation made by the President pro tempore on Friday last, with the unanimous consent of the Senate.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General of the United States, inviting the attention of the Senate to the great increase of labor and expense imposed on that Department by the act of March 3, 1883, to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 14th ultimo, a supplemental report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office relative to the unlawful fencing of public lands; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of W. B. Washburn, late a Senator in this body, and a large number of other citizens of Greenfield, Mass., praying for appropriations for the education of the tribes of Indians called Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches, in the Indian Territory, and the Bannocks, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Shoshones, Sioux, and Utes, otherwise situated. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the papers will be received and so referred.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present the memorial of Frank M. One or two of these memorials are in the nature of letters to myself, but are evidently intended for the public use I make of them. Mr. JACKSON. On behalf of the minority of the committee I present their views in opposition to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee presents the views of the minority; which, with the report of the committee, will be printed, to accompany the bill, which will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 772) granting a pension to Erastus W. Babson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1433) granting a pension to Mary E. Murray, to report it without amendment. There is also a minority report in this case.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask leave to present the views of the minority in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report and the views of the minority will be printed, and the bill placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1080) granting a pension to Mary E. Murray, to report it back; and recommend its indefinite postponement the House bill covering the same case.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VANCE submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the bill (S. 1876) providing for an inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1004) to accept and ratify certain agreements made with the Sioux Indians, and to grant a right of way to the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company through the Sioux reservation, in Dakota, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. I wish to say in reference to that bill and another which I have in my hand of a similar character that I am instructed by the committee to ask the Senate to pass them at this time. I think there will be no objection. If there be any debate, I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he allow the regular morning business at least to be disposed of before asking the Senate to consider or to pass any bill.

Mr. DAWES. I thought this measure might go through without objection. I have another just like it which I should like to have passed at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to consider the bill reported by him at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object now.

Mr. DAWES. I of course must yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, if he insists upon it.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it is better we should get through with the regular morning business before any request of that kind is entertained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar subject to call.

Mr. DAWES. I am also instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1496) to accept and ratify certain agreements made with the Sioux Indians, and to grant a right of way to the Dakota Central Railway Company throughout the Sioux reservation, in Dakota, to report it with amendments. I should like to have this bill passed at the same time with the one first reported.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Joint Committee on Public Printing opened the proposals for annual contracts for paper for the Printing Office on the 31st of January. Parsons & Co., of New York, a reputable firm of paper dealers, sent a proposal which arrived an hour or two afterward, an hour or two too late. They addressed a communication to the President pro tempore of the Senate, which was referred to the Committee on Public Printing, and I am instructed by the committee to submit a report, which I ask may be printed and laid upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 996) granting a pension to David C. Canfield, late a private in Company D, Fifth Pennsylvania Reserves; and

A bill (S. 976) to increase the pension of Peter Lennon.

Mr. SLATER presented a report from the Committee on Public Lands to accompany the bill (S. 428) to forfeit certain public lands granted to the Oregon Central Railroad Company, in the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington, reported from the Committee on Public Lands March 14, 1884.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1011) granting the right of way over the public lands in Alabama and Florida to the Alabama Diagonal Railroad Company and to grant to said company the right to purchase public lands in said States, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1012) granting the right of way over the public lands in Alabama to the Gulf and Chicago Air-Line Railway Company, and for other purposes, reported a bill (S. 1909) granting the right of way over the public lands in Alabama and to grant lands to said State in aid of the Gulf and Chicago Air-Line Railway Company, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title; and Senate bill 1012 was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them adversely; and they were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 442) to restore to market and sale certain lands of the United States in the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin and to authorize their sale subject to the right of flowage;

A bill (S. 515) to establish the price of lands in the Bitter Root Valley, Mont.; and

A bill (S. 263) to pay for the survey of certain public lands in Washington Territory.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1273) for the relief of the State University of California, reported it adversely.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

A bill (S. 628) to repeal an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts,' approved July 27, 1866," approved March 2, 1867, and also to repeal the third paragraph of section 639 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (S. 451) to define the jurisdiction of the circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 17) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. LAPHAM. What proposed amendment is that?

Mr. HOAR. It is a proposition to insert the word "nativity" before "race, color, or previous condition of servitude," in article 15, section 1, of the amendments. I move that the joint resolution be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 651) to authorize the President to restore Charles Brewster to his former rank in the Army, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar until I can examine the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. LAPHAM. The bill (S. 155) for the protection of fisheries on the Atlantic coast was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with a view of looking into the question whether the proposed legislation is an interference with our treaty obligations with Great Britain. The committee have examined that question, and I am instructed by them to report the bill back with the expression of the opinion they entertain that there is no interference with our treaty obligations in the legislation proposed. We ask, therefore, that the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the question, and that the bill and all papers connected with it be referred to the Committee on Fish and Fisheries, lately appointed, including the testimony which was taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, if there be no objection, and the report will be printed.

A bill (S. 281) granting a pension to James S. Wright.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN introduced a bill (S. 1911) for the relief of Duncan L. Clinch, of the State of Georgia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BROWN. I desire also to present with the bill the petition of Mr. Duncan L. Clinch, admitting that he labors under disabilities under the fourteenth constitutional amendment and asking that they be relieved. The bill relates to disabilities. I move that the bill be referred, with the accompanying petition, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1912) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and Government offices at the city of Atchison, Kans.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HARRIS. I hold in my hand the petition of the Board of Trade, and the Iron, Coal, and Manufacturers' Association of the city of Chattanooga, State of Tennessee, asking that the efficiency of the Signal Service be increased in respect to flood observations upon the Tennessee and other rivers of the United States. Accompanying the petition is a bill prepared by the board-of trade. I ask leave to introduce the bill and to accompany it with the petition.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a bill (S. 1916) to authorize the Secretary of War to issue clothing to the inmates of the Veterans' Home of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 1921) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms, ammunition, and accouterments between the Territory of Montana and the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANSOM introduced a bill (S. 1922) to authorize an exchange of North Carolina bonds now held by the United States Government; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1924) providing for the organization of the Patent Office into an independent department, and for giving it the exclusive control of the building known as the Patent Office and of the fund pertaining to that office; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the bill lie on the table, and I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate at some convenient time during the week, in the morning hour, to give some reasons why I think that a bill like this bill should be passed. I do not regard this as a perfect bill, but I think that it contains the germ, the principle of legislation which has become necessary and can not be delayed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 1925) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes;" which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was Ordered, That Senate bill No. 247, "A bill to extend the duration of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for other purposes," be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

GAS FOR COAST LIGHTS.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas recent discoveries in the use of gas as an illuminant for beacons and buoys are claimed greatly to improve coast navigation and at a largely reduced cost from that of methods now in general use:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into and report to the Senate the merits of all systems of coast lights, beacons, and buoys using gas as an illuminant, and to this end said committee is hereby authorized to make such tests and examinations as may be deemed necessary, inviting the owners of such inventions or discoveries to appear and exhibit the same; and for the purpose of ascertaining the necessity for such improved aids to navigation the committee is empowered to send for persons and papers and to take the testimony of such vessel-owners, merchants, and others as may appear or be summoned before them.

SPECIAL ATTORNEYS OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask for the immediate consideration of the following resolution:

Whereas on the 23d day of January, 1884, the Senate adopted the following:

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to inform the Senate when and by whom the compensation for special attorneys in the star-route cases in the District of Columbia was fixed, and to furnish copies of any agreements or memoranda relating thereto; and if, in his judgment, the compensation is unreasonable, why he ratified and continued the same. Also whether said attorneys, or any of them, are now in the employ of the Department of Justice, and at what compensation."

Whereas no reply has been made thereto: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to furnish the information demanded or to give his reasons for neglecting or refusing so to do.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over under the rule and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 351) authorizing the muster-in and discharge of Henry Z. Blinn;

A bill (H. R. 1567) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Capt. John G. Tod, of the Texas navy;

A bill (H. R. 1615) for the relief of the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley;

A bill (H. R. 1965) granting a pension to John A. Crozier;

A bill (H. R. 6090) for the relief of Sidney Henderson, executrix of John Henderson, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 2487) for the relief of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. 3932) directing the Adjutant-General of the United States Army to place the name of James M. Thomas on the muster-rolls of Company C, Second Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry, and for other purposes.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes, be made a special order for Thursday next, at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is objected to, and the motion may have to lie over one day under the new rules.

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose the motion may be made at once. I do not know of any rule to the contrary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires a vote of two-thirds to make a bill a special order.

Mr. HARRISON. I will state to the Senate that I make this motion by direction of the Committee on Territories, not with the expectation that the bill will probably be reached for consideration on that day; but as it is the request of the committee, and a reasonable one I think, I was in hopes that the Senate would at least give us an early opportunity for the consideration of the bill. If the motion is in order, if I can not persuade my friend to withdraw his objection, as I hope he will, there is nothing for me but to submit the motion to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is now in order. There is nothing else before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think the bill will occupy much time. It was not our intention to spend much time with it; I do not think we need to do so; but it was our desire to bring it to an early vote in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope my distinguished friend from Indiana will not insist on the bill being made a special order. We have already consumed the last two weeks——

Mr. HOAR. Is the motion debatable under the new rules?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the new rules it is not debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator from Missouri will be allowed to respond to what I said.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; I will waive my objection. I beg the Senator's pardon. I ought not to have objected after the Senator from Indiana had spoken. I merely wanted to save time. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have nothing further to say. I am against the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Indiana to make the bill a special order for Thursday next.

Mr. VEST. I understand that that motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not debatable under the new rules, the Chair thinks.

Mr. VEST. I should like to make a statement as coming from the minority of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri aks unanimous consent of the Senate to make a statement in regard to the bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. VEST. I was not in the Senate at the time that the chairman of the Committee on Territories made the report, or else I should have stated, as I propose to state now, that the minority of the committee, of which I am one, is opposed to the passage of the bill, and opposed to making it any special order; at least in that regard I speak for myself. As to the time it will take to dispose of the bill, I can not agree with the Senator from Indiana. It is a measure that will give rise to considerable debate, and the Senate may prepare itself for a discussion on the merits of the bill if it is made a special order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to inform the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that the Chair was in error in supposing that this motion is not debatable. It is debatable. A motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill would not be debatable, but a motion to make a bill a special order is debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not desire to spend time now with any debate on the motion. It is, I think, a question of very high privilege. I believe we shall be able to show that we have in that part of the Territory which is by the bill to be constituted into a State every element of a great and prosperous American State. I believe we shall be able to show that all of those conditions exist which have in any case been applied to any of the Territories when they came to seek admission into the Union. I do not want, however, to anticipate the debate; but I ask the Senate to give us an early opportunity to discuss this question and bring it to an issue here, in order that it may go to the House in time for some action there.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to say, as a member of the Committee on Territories, that I concur fully with what has been said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. For one, I dissent from this measure, and I should like to have a full opportunity to debate it. I do not object to its coming up at an early day or anything of that kind, however.

Mr. HARRISON. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. GARLAND. As one of the committee, I did not agree with the report which was made by the Senator from Indiana, but still I have never been averse to considering any subject that any Senator thought it was worth while to have considered and asked to have considered. I do not think, however, that Thursday is a proper time to fix for the consideration of the bill. We have now already ahead of it the educational bill, the pleuro-pneumonia bill, and probably some other bills, that Senators are asking to be advanced. I think if the Senator would say a week or ten days or say two weeks, rather——

Mr. HARRISON. I am entirely willing to yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, and to make it Wednesday of next week.

Mr. GARLAND. I should not object to that for one, or rather Thursday of next week, although I am not in favor of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I will accept that suggestion, and say Thursday of next week.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the Senator from Indiana ought to realize the fact that the bill will not pass readily or become a law at this session of Congress, and it is an absolute waste of time, a useless consumption of the time of the Senate, to be making it a special order and discussing it for a week or ten days.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not believed that we should divide upon this bill for the admission of Dakota upon any party line. I do believe that when we come to discuss the question I shall be able to show that no man can take a reasonable standing in opposition to the bill, either upon the question of population or upon the size or character of the proposed State as compared with any of the States that we represent here. I deem it my duty, as the chairman of the committee at least, to bring the attention of the Senate and its consideration to this bill at an early day. When the time comes for debate I hope we shall be able to show to every one who believes that reasonably and where the conditions exist out of which an American State should be constituted the Territories ought to be organized into States; that there are here a stronger argument and better reasons and safer conditions for the erection of an American State than have often existed in the case of States that have been admitted to the Union.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Indiana does not propose, as he says, to debate the question at this time, he ought not to make the statement that no one can make a reasonable opposition to the measure which he seeks now to make a special order in the Senate. I undertake to say with just as much confidence that there is no earthly reason for pressing the measure upon the American Congress at this time. Measures of the greatest national importance are now lagging behind and claiming the consideration of the Senate. It is well known that Congress is far behind in its work at this session, until there is a clamor through the country now for us to proceed to matters of urgent legislation. If one-tenth of what the people who apply for this new State now say and swore to before the committee is true it is a perfect Elysium, it is the happiest land, next to that of Canaan, which has existed since the creation of the world; and yet according to the Senator there is urgent and absolute and imperative necessity that all other measures should be put aside and that we should go into a lengthy debate in regard to this bill. I say they have not the population, and I can prove it, unless you go into the realms of imagination outside of figures, to entitle them to a Representative in the other branch of Congress. If the Senator proposes to debate it, I am ready at any time to take up that issue with him.

Mr. CONGER. It is the object of asking an early day for the consideration of the bill that the friends of the bill, or its opponents, if there are any, may present to the Senate their reasons for and against the adoption of the measure. My friend from Missouri says that all the statements show that the people of that Territory are in the most delightful condition in the world. Still my friend from Missouri is not happy.

Mr. VEST. I am not unhappy. It is your side that is unhappy. I am willing to let it stay as it is.

Mr. CONGER. It is the opinion of a majority of the committee, and, as I understood, of all, that the bill should be presented for consideration at an early day and its merits discussed. I have no doubt of the result whenever the subject can be brought before the Senate and the facts in the case presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Indiana. [Having put the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the exact proposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Indiana as modified is that this bill, the Dakota bill, be made a special order for Thursday, the 3d day of April next.

Mr. HARRISON. Thursday week.

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps I ought to state, as a member of the Committee on Territories, that I happened to be absent at the time the report was made, and, with the Senators from Missouri, Arkansas, and Florida, I dissent from the provisions of the bill reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SEWELL (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HILL. I announced a pair, but I am authorized to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS].

Mr. GROOME (after having voted in the negative). I desire also to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I did not know this was a political question, making a bill a special order. If it is I should like to know.

Mr. BUTLER (after having voted in the negative). As this seems to be a party question I feel constrained to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. HAMPTON (after having voted in the negative). I was requested the other day to pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. I do not know whether the pair continues, but I do not see him in his seat, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. ALLISON. I have transferred my pair to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN], and I vote "yea." The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS].

Mr. GROOME. Under the statement just made by the Senator from Iowa, I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 23; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Two-thirds of the Senate not having voted for the motion, it fails.

SALARIES OF DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. HOAR. I move to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 373, being the bill (S. 1852) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum.

Mr. DAWES. I wish my colleague would consent to permit me to call up the bills which I reported this morning. If they cause any debate I shall not urge them now.

Mr. HOAR. This matter has been discussed for several days and there has been a test vote, on which the Senate was about four or five to one in favor of this bill. I hope we shall be able to dispose of it. I should like to oblige my colleague in any possible way, but I think this bill ought to be disposed of.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think the vote taken on my amendment the other day is a test of the opinion of the Senate in regard to increasing the salaries of the judges from $3,500 to $5,000.

Mr. HOAR. It is so far as I am informed by such inquiry as I have been able to make.

Mr. DAWES. I am afraid my colleague is too sanguine about the time it will take to consider this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. It will necessarily lead to further discussion. I do not know that I shall participate in it, but other gentlemen desire to do so. It is a question of very great gravity, because when we get this statute on the statute-book we can not afterward repeal it, and we are jumping $1,500 at a single bound on these salaries, when we had better not go more than $500 at a session, to say the least.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to remind the Senator——

Mr. MORGAN. I am not discussing the merits of the bill. I am discussing the reason why it ought not to be gone into now, and why it will take a good deal of time to dispose of it. The questions involved are important and the bill is not by any means satisfactory to the Senate, I think, and it certainly is not to the committee; at least to some members of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind the Senator that under the new rule adopted a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill is not debatable.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg pardon of the Senate for having violated the rule, but the Senator from Massachusetts had set me the example.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1852) fixing the salaries of the several judges of the United States district courts at $5,000 per annum, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. VAN WYCK, in line 4, after the word "of," to strike out "five" and insert "four;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the salaries of the several judges of the district courts of the United States shall hereafter be at the rate of $4,000 per annum.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COKE. I propose to amend the bill by adding the following as a new section:

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person related by consanguinity or affinity to any circuit or district judge of the United States to hold any office or employment in or pertaining to any court presided over by such judge; and any judge who shall knowingly cause or permit a violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. President, this is an amendment suggested by a very great abuse which has existed in the State that I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. I have known all the Federal judges ever appointed for Texas, and with the single exception of Judge McCormick, the present judge of the northern judicial district of Texas, every one of them has followed the practice of filling the offices of his court with his own or his wife's relatives. The practice of nepotism has been gross, flagrant, and with the exception named has been uniform with them.

The consequence has been, as will always be the case where this is done, that parties litigant in the courts have enormous cost-bills taxed against them, and are placed at the disadvantage if they would right themselves of having to make an appeal to the judge of the court against the action of one of his near relatives. This is not right, just, or fair. The people are entitled to impartial judges, unbiased by relationship or any other consideration in all their judicial business.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Texas will allow me, I would suggest to him a modification of his amendment. As the amendment reads, it provides that no person related as described shall hold any office, &c., which would apply to a marshal. If he would narrow his amendment to the statement that no judge shall appoint any relative to an office of which he had the appointment, I think that would be proper.

Mr. COKE. Then there would be this trouble: The judge appoints the clerks; the clerks appoint their deputies. The clerk appointed might be a figure-head, and he would appoint the judge's son or son-in-law or other relative as a deputy. The office of the marshal is not an office pertaining to the court. It is a district office, filled by appointment of the President. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

It shall be unlawful for any person related by consanguinity or affinity to any circuit or district judge of the United States to hold any office or employment in or pertaining to any court presided over by such judge; and any judge who shall knowingly cause or permit a violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the honorable Senator from Texas, without disrespect, if he accepts the scriptural doctrine of the origin of the human race through Adam?

Mr. COKE. I will discuss that question on some other occasion. At this time I am giving attention to the pending bill.

Mr. HOAR. If he does, I ask whether every human being is not related by consanguinity or affinity to every other? There is no limit of degree in the amendment; it does not limit it to the tenth cousins or one-hundredth cousins.

Mr. COKE. The terms consanguinity and affinity are very well understood by everybody except the Senator from Massachusetts. They are terms the signification of which is defined in all the law-books. They are used in the statute laws, and everybody understands them.

Mr. HOAR. But this does not state the degree, if the Senator will pardon me, because this is a serious point.

Mr. COKE. I do not yield, thinking there is nothing in the Senator's objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas declines to yield and has the floor.

Mr. COKE. I have introduced the amendment not through any hostile intent to this bill, because I intend to vote for it, but I desire to correct an abuse which is known in the State where I live to be a very great one, so great that on the second day of the meeting of this Congress I presented a memorial, which I have before me now, printed in the RECORD, signed by the United States district attorney for the western district of Texas, asking Congressional action on this very subject.

We have three districts in Texas, the northern, the eastern, and the western districts. In the northern district, presided over by Judge McCormick, there is no complaint. In every other judicial district and under every other judge who ever sat on the Federal bench in Texas there has been great and loud complaint, and with justice.

Why, Mr. President, what chance has a suitor in the courts when his cost-bill is taxed by the clerk who is the son-in-law of the judge or the son or the nephew of the judge on the bench—what chance has that litigant to appeal successfully against wrong to the judge? What prospect of success to appeal to the head of the family for relief against a wrong being done by one of the minor members? There is none. People should not be placed in that predicament; and in my State I assert it to be a fact that ever since the annexation of Texas in every court except Judge McCormick's, in the northern district of Texas, the people have with good cause complained loudly of this great wrong. I say it is not just. Good officers can be obtained outside of the judge's family. We are making now an addition to the judge's salary; we are making an additional provision for him. He ought to be able to get along with this additional provision, without filling the offices of the court with his family and relatives.

Mr. President, I have had this matter before the Judiciary Committee. On the second day of the meeting of this Congress when I presented the memorial of the attorney of the western district of Texas I called the attention of the committee to it in some remarks I submitted at the time and had the memorial referred to that committee where it now sleeps. Nothing has been done with it. I find an opportunity here in the way of amendment to this bill to do what I think ought to be done, and therefore I present the amendment and believe that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Texas, which I am sure he will accept, which will cover his point. The criticism which I endeavored to call to the attention of my friend from Texas was that he has not limited the degree of consanguinity or affinity. It is true that the words "related by consanguinity or affinity" have a well-known legal meaning, but those relationships are within different degrees, and the difference varies in the common law, the civil law, and the canon law. As everybody knows in regard to the matter of marriages, by some laws you can not marry your first cousin. I propose this as a substitute for the Senator's amendment:

No judge or officer by him appointed shall appoint to any office or employment in or pertaining to any court presided over by such judge any person related to him by affinity or consanguinity within the degree of first cousin.

Mr. COKE. That does not go far enough.

Mr. MAXEY. How about brothers-in-law?

Mr. HOAR. Consanguinity and affinity include the relatives of the wife in the same degree. I trust my friend from Texas will accept the amendment.

Mr. COKE. I doubt very much if that will accomplish the object I have in view.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment to the amendment, as follows:

No judge or officer by him appointed shall appoint to any office or employment in or pertaining to any court presided over by such judge any person related to him by affinity or consanguinity within the degree of first cousin.

Mr. HOAR. I move that as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be obliged to the Chair if both the original amendment and the amendment as amended should be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment originally proposed by Mr. COKE and the amendment to it moved by Mr. HOAR and adopted.

Mr. MAXEY. I have knowledge of the complaint made throughout the State of Texas, alluded to by my colleague, for a great many years. I think it is true almost without exception that appointments have been made to these positions of persons related to the presiding judge, the effect of which has been that suitors have an idea that where a bill of costs amounts to a great deal they can not appeal from the taxation of the bill without going into the trial of it with the feeling that the judge is on the side of the clerk who makes out that bill of costs. This is the way in which justice has been administered in the Federal courts. But it is not the case in the district in which I live, the northern district. There never has been the slightest complaint of partiality; there has never been the slightest complaint that the judge appointed his kith or kin to any position whatever, and there is a better feeling on the part of the people of the northern district toward the administration of justice in the Federal courts in that district, I venture to say, than in any other district in the entire Southern States, because the people have entire confidence in the ability and impartiality of the judge, and feel sure that justice is legally administered in accordance with the forms of law.

The amendment speaks of the affinity or consanguinity being within the degree of first cousin. I do not know whether that would reach the object. The great trouble with us is the appointment of sons-in-law and brothers-in-law.

That the principle of the amendment of my colleague is right, I have no doubt. I believe the judge on the bench should be not only free from all evil influence, but should be free from the appearance of all evil influence.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the arguments in favor of rewarding the judges of the United States district courts commence to come in in great force. The two Senators from Texas have now discovered that the judges in their State and elsewhere in the Southern States have been guilty of the most outrageous nepotism in the appointment of their relatives to all the offices, clerkships, and deputy clerkships and receiverships, and the various very important and very lucrative offices connected with the courts; and yet these Senators are assisting the balance of the Senate in the very profound desire to reward them for such services as these to their families.

I think, sir, if this debate goes on a little while longer we shall get probably to the bottom of this subject, and not only what I have been compelled reluctantly to state on this floor in opposition to the increase of these salaries in favor of the judges who now hold the office, calling up as I have done the reports of the officers of the Department of Justice, but we shall have re-enforcements from every quarter to show that the Senate of the United States is now engaged in rewarding by an increase of salary a set of men who have done very little else than abuse the powers of their offices for the perversion of right and public justice.

On the chancery side of a district or circuit court of the United States, where the district judges may preside in the circuit courts, the occasion is often, very much too often, presented for the appointment of receivers for the administration of very large estates, particularly of enormous railway corporations. I myself have seen a district judge of the United States as anxious for the opportunity to wreck a railroad and appoint a receiver as ever a Comanche Indian was for a buffalo, with his war paint on and his bow and arrow or gun or whatever else of weapons of destruction he had. I recall one instance of such a flagrant character as that I was compelled, as counsel for some of the bondholders of a railroad company, while being a private citizen of the United States and entirely unknown in Washington, to come here and present before a committee of this body the effort that was then being made, and this body and the other House immediately acting upon the representations which were made snatched the circuit-court powers away from that judge and required that he should no longer be able to exercise them in his district court. That was one of the first instances in my experience as a lawyer which led me to the conclusion that the powers of the United States circuit and district courts, particularly in chancery causes, were capable of being abused to a degree that scarcely ever was permitted to the exercise of power in the world.

Now I appeal to the Senator from Texas who sits nearest me [Mr. COKE] to answer me if he does not believe that there are kin people of judges in his own State who have made $100,000 fee-money out of offices like these.

Mr. COKE. I can not say how much they have made, but I know they have made a great deal.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good. Does that Senator want to reward that judge for holding his place? I do not know who the judge is. I dare say, however, that he is a man who is upward of seventy years of age and entitled to retire upon his full pay, and yet he holds the office.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator permit me a word?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. COKE. I have to say to the Senator from Alabama that I am actuated by something higher than the view of rewarding anybody in the vote I give on this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I know.

Mr. COKE. Permit me to go on a little further. I do not propose to reward anybody. I introduced a memorial here a few days ago, signed by a large number of members of the bar of my State, asking for this increase of compensation for judges. I know the fact to be that the judge of the northern judicial district of Texas has had to move away from the city of Dallas, the principal point in his district, and off the railroad, to where with his large family he can live on his salary. I know these facts. I have no desire to reward anybody, but I do desire to pay the judges a competent salary. At the same time I desire to purify the judicial service by the passage of this amendment forbidding nepotism.

Mr. MORGAN. The way to forbid nepotism is to forbid the men who are guilty of it. The way to forbid the oppression of the people in the taxing costs and fees and charges against men and hauling them from one place to another for trial, is to forbid the men who are guilty of the toleration of it upon the bench. These things would not occur if the judicial departments of the United States to-day were occupied by men who were deserving of them.

The Senator from Texas says he has a higher standard than the mere question of personal reward to any man for his service or the withholding of personal reward because of his lack of service. It makes no difference to me what the standard of the Senator from Texas may be. My standard is not to reward out of the Treasury of the United States a set of men who are incompetent or unjust; and if these judges in Texas have been doing these things which the Senator from Texas informs us, if they have abused the powers of their offices, they are not entitled to this reward.

It is not agreeable to me to have these things to say; but when I present to the Senate of the United States through authentic reports of the Department of Justice matters which relate to the administration of that Department in my own State, and I show from these reports that the judges there have not only abused their powers but have tolerated the abuse of the powers of all their subordinates, and that these have resulted in outrages upon the people of my State, I think that I have a right rather to the sympathy of my brother Senators, and especially from the South, than to have them vote a reward to a man who has done these things which have been thus published to the Senate and to the world by an addition of $1,500 to his salary.

Sir, if a Senator on this floor were to tell me that the effect of this law would be to keep in office a man whom the Government officers themselves have been compelled to denounce as having abused the powers of the great trust confided to him, I would stay here during the rest of my life before I would vote to reward the judge over their protest. They can have their own way and put their standard as high as they please. I shall be content when I have advertised to the world that I am trying to protect the honesty and fidelity of the judges. Then Senators can take to themselves such credit as they may find in the fact that they are willing to reward them notwithstanding the reports laid before the country and before the Senate to-day showing that they are unworthy of those offices.

Now, sir, there is a judge in the State of Texas, I am informed, who is over 70 years of age. He has been holding on to his office for some years if I am correctly informed. I may be mistaken as to his age——

Mr. COKE. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. MAXEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MORGAN. There are judges, I am informed, in the United States who are over age but who still hold on to their offices and exercise their powers when by resigning they might draw the salaries during the balance of their lives, and there are many who are approaching 70 years of age.

Mr. COKE. I will say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that there was a judge of whom that thing was said, that he could have been retired and yet he held on to the office.

Mr. MORGAN. Now the Senator from Texas has gone further than I expected I should be able to go in this case. There was a judge in Texas who could have retired under the law——

Mr. COKE. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Who was over 70 years of age, and of whom it was said, I suppose by the bar, that he held on to the office and did not resign because his relatives were in office under his appointment, and if he had resigned it would have put the power of appointment in the hand of somebody else and his relatives would have gone without their reward. If that thing ever occurs or if ever there is a possibility of its occurring, then there is an evil in the case that needs the remedy of law before we undertake to increase the salaries of these judges.

This honorable Committee on the Judiciary, a very able and distinguished committee, have informed us through their chief spokesman here, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], that they had great difficulty in coming to a conclusion about this bill, that they at first had agreed to report quite a number of the district judges of the United States for an advance of salary. I believe they did make the report, but when they came with it into the Senate the Senator from Arkansas informs us that there was some discontent on the part of certain Senators that their judges had not been relieved by an increase of salary, and thereupon the Committee on the Judiciary thought it was better to go back and to make a law which should include all, so that every judge, good and bad, it made no difference what his record might have been, should stand upon a parity and that they should all receive $5,000 a year for their services.

Mr. President, I submit to the Senate whether the other course would not have been the proper one. That committee came to its own just conclusion that there were certain judges who ought to be rewarded in the United States because the salaries of their offices were too small for the amount of labor they were compelled to perform and the amount of expense they were compelled to undergo. Why was it that this brave and bold committee of the greatest jurists in this body, and therefore among the greatest in the United States if not in the world found it necessary to abandon their first conclusion to reward those men who really needed the reward, and to take in all the balance, whether they needed it or deserved it or not? There was an abandonment of principle in that, there was a concession to a mere rumor of opposition in the Senate without the committee ever having taken the pains to bring this measure before the Senate to test its real sense on this proposition.

Now, without asserting that this last measure is not satisfactory at least to some Senators, if they meant to poll the Senate and to find out what the vote of the Senate was before they introduced it, why did they not come to me as well as to other Senators and ask if I had reasons to suggest against their second proposition? It never occurred to me that the Senate of the United States would place upon the statute-book an amendment that can not be gotten rid of hereafter or reduced at all, leaping up from $3,500 to $5,000 a year in consideration of these services. We find that this committee is not a unit in favor of this bill; at least one of the gentlemen upon the committee has declared his opposition to it, and has voted against the increase of the salary in favor of all judges who are now upon the bench.

Now, sir, if I was contending for anything else than right and justice and duty upon this occasion I would long since have abandoned any opposition to this measure; but I will stand here and I will prevent it in every legal way I can, and I do hope that I may be able to put upon the records of the Senate enough of facts to cause the committee of the House to inquire more profoundly into the effects of this measure than the Senate Judiciary Committee seem to have done. We have a lot of judges on the district bench who are approaching 70 years of age, perhaps many, certainly half a dozen or more. What do we do? We immediately raise their salaries $1,500 a year in order to enable them to retire when they get to be 70 years of age on $5,000, instead of $3,500.

Is that a fair way to deal with the money of the people of the United States? No, sir; neither is it just in itself, because while this bill professes to reward men more in accordance with their merits and deserts in consequence of the higher labors that are imposed upon them than used to be, we put in no qualification as to what the salary shall be after the man declares himself to be incompetent to sit as a judge by tendering his resignation and putting himself upon the retired-list. Here we are giving to men now approaching 70 years of age $5,000 a year upon the pretext that the labors men perform require that they should have a larger compensation, when we know they have nothing to do but to resign their offices and continue to draw the $5,000 a year as long as they may live.

It is my opinion that honorable Senators on this floor will hear from this after a while; and this gross unnecessary extravagance on the part of this body can not be polished off or glossed off by the mere fact that we want to have a high standard of judicial compensation when we see that it is rewarding incompetency in some cases, nepotism in others, and providing large pensions for officers who may retire and will retire very soon at 70 years of age. When the time shall come I will offer another amendment to try to graduate this pay $100 a year during the time the officer may be in the service, so that when a judge reaches the age of 70 years he will retire not with $5,000 annual salary, but he will retire on a smaller sum.

Senators need not flatter themselves that the people of the United States are not noticing what they are doing with the Treasury. The increase of salary proposed by this bill is worthy of the denunciation which I give to it upon this floor, that it is for the mere glory of the legal profession and not for the good of the country. I regret very much that I am brought into antagonism with the committee on this question, but the committee do not stand on firm ground. They come up here and apologize for their bill, rather than defend it. They must know, must feel after a full survey of the facts that the first ground that they said they intended to take of increasing the salary of those judges who needed it and who had won it and earned it, was the true ground, rather than to increase the salaries of all in order that we might quiet perhaps opposition to the increase of the salaries of some that needed it. That is not the way to legislate in this country. Legislate upon the merits of your bill, and not try to silence opposition by including in your bill those men who might perchance be disposed to mouth against your bill or to make complaint of it. There is too much of that in this country. Here are legitimate works of internal improvement that need the assistance of this Government; and yet we find committees reporting bills and Senators sustaining them which contain appropriations which we all know are not for the public service, but merely for private advantage, merely to assist somebody in getting an office from the people; and we are expected and we are required too to support bills containing bad measures because they contain some good measures. It is expected of me here to-day and of every Senator on this floor that we shall give to every judge in the United States on the district court bench, fifty of them, $5,000 a year, whether they deserve it or not, because there are some of the judges in the country who according to the opinion of the Judiciary Committee deserve as much as $5,000 a year. I believe there are some who do deserve it. There are some districts in which this would be a meritorious reward; but because I believe that, it is no reason why I should be compelled to vote for a measure which contains a reward to men who have not earned it and who do not deserve it, and who deserve a fate very different from that of the complimentary action of this body.

Mr. HOAR. I hope we shall have a vote. The bill has been debated four or five mornings.

Mr. COKE. I offer an amendment to the substitute of the Senator from Massachusetts which I ask may be read.

The SECRETARY. In the first line of the amendment, after the word "judge," it is proposed to insert "of any district or circuit court of the United States," and at the end of the amendment to add "and any person guilty of a violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

Mr. HOAR. I accept that. I hope it will be accepted by unanimous consent.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let the amendment be reported as it will stand if amended.

The SECRETARY. The amendment, if amended as proposed, will read:

No judge of any district or circuit court of the United States or officer by him appointed shall appoint to any office or employment in or pertaining to any court presided over by such judge any person related to him by affinity or consanguinity within the degree of first cousin; and any person guilty of a violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I should be glad to have the interpretation of the Senator from Massachusetts of one point in the amendment, and that is whether it applies to future appointments solely or whether it includes those heretofore made.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose it applies to the future; but the evil which this amendment is aimed at is masterships in chancery, auditorships, and things of that kind, where there is a new appointment for every case. Of course you would not interpose in the middle of a case with such officers or with any of those officers with the single exception of assistant clerks. The clerks have to be reappointed every three years, so that all the assistant clerks who are in office now in violation of this provision would come up for reappointment. It is not worth while, therefore, to go into the past, because it would make great mischief.

Mr. MILLER, of California. My objection is that it ought not to be applied to the clerks at all.

Mr. HOAR. That has been adopted by the Senate. This is to make it a misdemeanor to violate the act.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Then I shall vote against the bill if the amendment has been adopted and is retained.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I did not hear the colloquy between the two Senators. The Senator from California propounded an inquiry which I desired to know the answer to, as to what was the effect of this amendment. Now, as it appears from the public discussion, and from conversation between Senators who have taken interest in this matter, the appointment of the officers referred to has been deemed a perquisite of the judge, which probably eked out his salary of $3,500 a year. If the salary is to be raised to $5,000, is there any reason why the family of the judge, after he is paid $5,000 a year, shall still continue in office under him? I presume that was the point of the inquiry of the Senator from California, but I did not understand the criticism of the Senator from Massachusetts upon that proposition. My notion is to have this amendment reach where it should, and directly strike at the appointments previously made.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. If a man has been appointed a master in chancery and has half got through the trial of a case, you do not want to turn him out and make the parties pay another man?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No.

Mr. HOAR. So of an auditor. That is the class. Those are appointments for each case. Nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand instances of the evil you want to reach are instances where the appointment is made in each case. You do not want to strike at cases already begun.

Mr. VAN WYCK. How about the clerks and deputy clerks?

Mr. HOAR. The deputy clerks are appointed every three years.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The clerks are the most important in my judgment. I understand the Senator's proposition as to masters and auditors for each case; but here, for instance, the judge has his son——

Mr. HOAR. There are not five such cases in the United States.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then strike the five cases out.

Mr. HOAR. They will go out in time.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Suppose there are only five judges who have sons fastened in these offices on the Treasury of the nation; strike them out. There is no difficulty about this matter. Make it plain, so that there shall be no chance to quibble hereafter. Strike down that perquisite of the judge when you are raising his salary to $5,000 a year. Now, if he ekes it out by appointing his son or stepson his clerk, fix it so that there shall be no question about the matter. Let the amendment mean something after it is adopted. Surely a judge ought to be satisfied after he gets $5,000 to keep his family out of office; but let it be made so plain not only that he shall not appoint them in the future but shall drop them now. Why should there be any objection to that? Frame the amendment so that it shall meet the case it is aimed at——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill known as the school bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. R. 64) providing for the addition of $10,000 to the contingent fund of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 9, 10, and 11 to the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes, and had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 12, and 13.
